Executive Summary

The chair of the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) presents this informational report on the implementation of the Judicial Council Directives on Staff Restructuring, as approved by the Judicial Council on August 31, 2012. The Judicial Council Staff Restructuring Directives specifically direct the Administrative Director to report to E&P before each council meeting on every directive. This informational report provides an update on the progress of implementation efforts.

Previous Council Action

The Judicial Council approved directives presented by E&P on August 31, 2012. These directives reaffirmed Judicial Council authority over the staff to the Judicial Council, restructured the staff agency, and endorsed a plan for monthly monitoring of the implementation of the directives by E&P. The last report to the Judicial Council on implementation efforts was provided by E&P at the August 21, 2015, Judicial Council meeting.

Implementation Progress

The staff to the Judicial Council offices continue to progress in implementing the Restructuring Directives in accordance with the timelines for implementation approved by the Judicial Council.

Since the August 2015 council meeting, the following directives were reported as complete:

- Directive 137 — The Real Estate and Facilities Management office reported that the three-year pilot phase for delegation of facility management services was concluded. The program continues in full operational status effective January 16, 2015.
- Classification and Compensation–Related Directives — In October of 2012 the reporting structure of the Judicial Council offices was changed as part of a new organizational structure that was approved by the Judicial Council. Additionally, on August 21, 2015, the completion of the Classification and Compensation study resulted in the implementation of a new salary structure for the organization. As a result, the following twenty-one directives related to organizational structure and the classification and compensation of specific positions were closed: 14, 16, 17, 20, 50, 51, 52, 54, 64, 72, 78, 81, 89, 90, 100, 106, 111, 123, 130, 135, and 142.

Council Directive 1

The Administrative Director of the Courts operates subject to the oversight of the Judicial Council. E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to report to E&P before each Judicial Council meeting on each item on this chart approved by the Judicial Council.

SEC Recommendation 7-1

The Administrative Director must operate subject to the oversight of the Judicial Council and will be charged with implementing the recommendations in this report if so directed.

TASK

x	COMPLETED: Judicial Council staff developed a formal process for monitoring and reporting on the status of Judicial council directives in 2012. This process has subsequently been modified to meet the needs of the Judicial Council, branch customers, and stakeholders.

To implement this directive of the council, a formal process was established in 2012 that provides information prepared by council staff leadership, in coordination with the Administrative Director and the Executive Team to be shared by the Administrative Director with the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) on all Judicial Council approved recommendations.

For every council meeting (with the exception of 2 meetings per year that occur close together), council staff prepare Activity Status Forms and/or council reports that are provided to the Administrative Director and the Executive Team for review and approval. The status information from the Activity Forms is then included in a Status Report provided by E&P to the council for each council meeting that includes the status for each and every council directive. Each of the directives is also listed on the courts.ca.gov website and the current status is updated accordingly.

In addition to regular reporting at council meetings, E&P requested that periodically, they meet as a group to review the completed directives. The last meeting was held in September 2013 and included a review and discussion of directives completed up to that point in time.

Please note, this process has evolved slightly from 2012 when we were providing Activity Status Forms for each of the 151 directives at each and every council meeting. The documentation became unwieldy for council review and so it was determined that the Activity Status Forms would still be completed, reviewed by council's Executive Team and maintained for E&P review meetings to explain in greater detail the implementation of the directives as requested. The status of the directive is still updated each council meeting for outstanding directives.

Council staff are currently reviewing the report format provided to council as well as the Restructuring web page on the courts.ca.gov website to create a new means of providing this information to the council and to branch stakeholders and will provide the new format at the April 16, 2015 council meeting.

Council Directive 6

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Rules and Projects Committee, consistent with its responsibility under rule 10.13 of the California Rules of Court, to establish and maintain a rule-making process that is understandable and accessible to justice system partners and the public, to consider SEC Recommendation 6-8 and report on any changes to the rule-making process to the Judicial Council.

SEC Recommendation 6-8

The AOC must develop a process to better assess the fiscal and operational impacts of proposed rules on the courts, including seeking earlier input from the courts before proposed rules are submitted for formal review. The AOC should establish a process to survey judges and court executive officers about the fiscal and operational impacts of rules that are adopted, and recommend revisions to the rules where appropriate. The AOC should recommend changes in the rules process, for consideration by the Judicial Council, to limit the number of proposals for new rules, including by focusing on rule changes that are required by statutory changes.

TASK

x	PENDING COMPLETED: RUPRO has implemented changes that seek earlier input on rules proposals and will, as part of annual agenda review, continue to review all advisory body proposals for rules and forms under RUPRO policies in effect at that time (the current policy is to give priority to proposals that are statutorily required or promote cost savings or efficiencies).

RUPRO began its efforts in 2011 to seek earlier input on rules proposals by working with the Joint Rules Subcommittee of the Trial Court Presiding Judge Advisory Committee (TCPJAC) and the Court Executives Advisory Committee.

In 2012, RUPRO created two priority levels for rules and forms proposals and directed the advisory bodies it oversees that each proposal must have a stated priority level and, with limited exceptions, only those with priority level 1 would be approved to develop during that year. Through the process for review and approval of annual agendas of advisory bodies, RUPRO reviews the description of each proposal and its priority level. RUPRO considers whether there is an urgent need for proposals and whether they will provide significant benefits to the courts and public. Through the invitation-to-comment process, RUPRO is informed of the following:

- whether the proposal statutorily mandated or needed for consistency with statute
- how the proposal addresses the issue being raised
- whether the proposal is expected to provide cost savings
- implementation requirements of courts (i.e. need for training, revision of policies and procedures, etc.)
- whether the proposal has different impacts on courts of different sizes

In, addition, in 2012, RUPRO asked advisory groups to suggest changes to rules and forms that could result in significant cost savings or efficiencies for the courts, including suggestions for the suspension or repeal of rules. Changes were made in response to the suggestions. RUPRO also revised the invitation to comment form to elicit more information from courts on the need for and implementation requirements of proposals.

RUPRO will, as part of annual agenda review, continue to review all advisory body proposals for rules and forms under RUPRO policies in effect at that time (the current policy is to give priority to proposals that are statutorily required or promote cost savings or efficiencies). The RUPRO Chair will continue to meet with TCPJAC Executive Committee on an ongoing basis to discuss the issues identified in this directive.

On an ongoing basis RUPRO will continue to review all advisory body proposals to ensure that there is an urgent need for proposals and that that the proposals will provide significant benefits to the courts and public.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

Since RUPRO began its review and prioritization of rules and form proposals, the number of proposals has been significantly reduced. For example in 2011, there were 64 proposals that circulated for comment; in 2014, the number was reduced to 22.

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators
			40	(1 inspector can inspect)

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

ANALYSIS: Principles and Practices for DOF Analysts

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

And the final question upon completing an analysis should always be: "Does this make sense?"

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academicians identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

GUIDELINES FOR THE ADMINISTRATION OF BRANCHWIDE PROJECTS AND INITIATIVES

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

x	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academicians identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive 9

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to develop a procedure for developing and communicating accurate cost estimates for projects, programs, and initiatives.

SEC Recommendation 7-59

The AOC must develop and communicate accurate cost estimates for projects, programs, and initiatives.

Reported By:	Finance
Contact:	Zlatko Theodorovic, Director

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose. Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive    10

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to develop a procedure to apply proper cost and contract controls and monitoring, including independent assessment and verification, for significant projects and programs.

SEC Recommendation    7-60

The AOC must apply proper cost and contract controls and monitoring, including independent assessment and verification, for significant projects and programs.

Reported By:	Finance
Contact:	Zlatko Theodorovic, Director

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Council Directive 11

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to develop a procedure to maintain proper documentation and records of its decision making process for significant projects and programs.

SEC Recommendation 7-61

The AOC must maintain proper documentation and records of its decision making process for significant projects and programs.

Reported By:	Finance
Contact:	Zlatko Theodorovic, Director

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

ANALYSIS: Principles and Practices for DOF Analysts

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

And the final question upon completing an analysis should always be: "Does this make sense?"

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

Attachment B

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Council Directive 12

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to develop a procedure to identify and secure sufficient funding and revenue streams necessary to support projects and programs, before undertaking them.

SEC Recommendation 7-62

The AOC must identify and secure sufficient funding and revenue streams necessary to support projects and programs, before undertaking them.

Reported By:	Finance
Contact:	Zlatko Theodorovic, Director

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

Attachment A

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

ANALYSIS: Principles and Practices for DOF Analysts

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

And the final question upon completing an analysis should always be: "Does this make sense?"

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

Attachment B

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Council Directive 13

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to develop a procedure to accurately report and make available information on potential costs of projects and impacts on the courts.

SEC Recommendation 7-63

The AOC must accurately report and make available information on potential costs of projects and impacts on the courts.

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose. Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

Attachment A

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

ANALYSIS: Principles and Practices for DOF Analysts

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

And the final question upon completing an analysis should always be: "Does this make sense?"

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

Attachment B

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Council Directive 14

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to conduct a comprehensive review of the AOC position classification system as soon as possible. The focus of the review must be on identifying and correcting misallocated positions, particularly in managerial classes, and on achieving efficiencies by consolidating and reducing the number of classifications.

In February 2015, the Administrative Director amended Judicial Council Policy 4.2 - Geographic Salary Differentials to ensure that salary differentials were applied consistently and accurately. In addition to an annual review, the policy now includes a quarterly validation procedure outlining the responsibilities of the Human Resources office in reconciling an employee's primary work location with the appropriate geographic salary differential.

Title: Geographic Salary Differentials

Policy

Statement: The Judicial Council has established salary ranges for employee compensation based on three geographic regions.

- Contents:
- (A) Geographic Regions
  - (B) Primary Work Location
  - (C) Change in Primary Work Location
  - (D) Temporary Changes in Primary Work Location
  - (E) Procedures to Change Primary Work Location

(A) Geographic Regions

The Judicial Council has established salary ranges for employee compensation based on the following three geographic regions, from lowest (region 1) to highest (region 3), reflecting recognizable cost-of-living and cost-of-labor differences throughout California:

Region 1	Region 1 (cont.)	Region 2	Region 3
Alpine	Modoc	Los Angeles	Alameda
Amador	Mono	Orange	Contra Costa
Butte	Nevada	San Bernardino	Marin
Calaveras	Placer	San Diego	Monterey
Colusa	Plumas	Santa Barbara	Napa
Del Norte	Riverside	Ventura	San Benito
El Dorado	Sacramento		San Francisco
Fresno	San Luis Obispo		San Joaquin
Glenn	Shasta		San Mateo
Humboldt	Sierra		Santa Clara
Imperial	Siskiyou		Santa Cruz
Inyo	Stanislaus		Solano
Kern	Sutter		Sonoma
Kings	Tehama
Lake	Trinity
Lassen	Tulare
Madera	Tuolumne
Mariposa	Yolo
Mendocino	Yuba
Merced

For more information on setting and adjusting salary ranges for Judicial Council classifications, please refer to Salary Structure, policy 4.1.

(B) Primary Work Location

Employee placement within a particular regional salary range is based on the employee's primary work location. Primary work location is defined as the location in which the employee physically spends the majority (i.e., more than 50 percent) of time working, based on the business needs of the Judicial Council. If an employee works in more than one location and does not work more than 50 percent of the time in any one geographic region, employee placement in a particular regional salary range is based on the work location in which the employee spends the largest percentage of work time.

A record of all regular work locations will be maintained in Human Resources along with the daily work schedules. On a quarterly basis, Human Resources will review the primary work location listed for each employee to ensure the employee's salary rate is within the salary range for the region in which the employee actually spends the majority of time working.

As part of the quarterly reconciliation process, Human Resources will validate the primary work location of each employee by comparing the information contained in the State Controller's Office database with the Judicial Council's Human Resources and Education Management System (HREMS).

Additionally, at the beginning of each fiscal year, a memorandum will be sent out to Office Leadership to obtain each employee's daily work hours, primary location, and when applicable, multiple work location schedule.

Any changes to the regular work location must be requested before implementation by submitting a Personnel Action Request \(PAR\) for review and approval. Changes requiring an adjustment to salary will occur in the pay period following the PAR approval.

Individuals regularly scheduled to work in more than one region or location, regardless of primary work location for salary purposes, will be reimbursed for work-related travel consistent with Finance guidelines and IRS criteria (determination of taxable expenses).

(C) Change in Primary Work Location

A change in an employee's primary work location from one region to another will result in an immediate salary rate adjustment only if the employee's rate is outside the new region's salary range for the employee's position. For example:

- A change to a higher-cost region will result in a salary rate increase only if the employee's salary rate is below the range minimum for the higher-cost region, in which event the employee's salary will be increased to the minimum of that range.
- A change to a lower-cost region will result in a salary rate decrease only if the employee's salary rate is above the range maximum for the lower-cost region, in which event the employee's salary will be reduced to the maximum of that range.

More information on salary ranges for the three geographic regions is at Judicial Council Salary Listing.

(D) Temporary Changes in Primary Work Location

If an employee's primary work location changes in connection with a temporary long-term assignment or transfer scheduled to last six months or longer, the temporary work location is considered the primary work location for pay purposes. If the temporary assignment results in a pay decrease, the office leadership may request maintaining the employee's then current rate of pay by submitting a written justification to the Classification and Compensation Unit for review. Requests to maintain pay rate must be approved by the Chief Administrative Officer. If the nature of the employee's job involves working in a multi-county territory, work-related movements are not considered temporary assignments for regional salary range purposes.

(E) Procedures to Change Primary Work Location

All PARs requesting primary work location changes must include the business justification for the change. Justifications must explain how the planned work location change will improve service delivery to judicial branch entities as well as any cost implications (e.g., leased office space). All PARs must be approved by the Chief Administrative Officer before any actual change in primary work location.

A change in an employee's primary work location may not only affect an employee's salary range, but also reimbursement of certain travel expenses within policy. It may also result in potential tax consequences to the employee for travel reimbursements.

RECONCILIATION OF EMPLOYEE WORK LOCATIONS

Validation Process

On a quarterly basis, Human Resources will compare and validate the information entered into (1) the State Controller's Office (SCO) for payroll purposes, (2) Human Resources and Education Management System (HREMS) for the employee's official human resources record, and (3) employee entries to HREMS, via self service, for the Judicial Council phone list.

Fields Requiring Review

Specifically the following data will be compared:

- SCO: the county of the employee's primary work location for salary and payroll purposes;
- HREMS: the city of the employee's primary work location for salary and official record keeping purposes;
- HREMS Employee Self Service: the primary work space number and work phone number for Judicial Council phone list purposes.

Based on the work area codes/phone numbers and the workspace number configurations, the HREMS team will be able to determine if the phone list information differs from the SCO and HREMS primary work location record.

Data Correction

Any differences will be reviewed with Pay and Benefits staff. Pay and Benefits staff will research the paperwork received (Personnel Action Request/Exemption Form), discuss with the employee's management, and make any adjustments needed so that the information in all three systems is consistent.

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: After a competitive bidding process, Fox Lawson & Associates was selected to conduct the classification and compensation study.

On September 9, 2013, the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) reviewed the methodology, criteria, and process used to score the Request for Proposal (RFP) bids, reviewed the final bid scoring and findings, and approved the awarding of the contract to the highest scored bidder.

In October 2013, E&P provided an update to the Judicial Council notifying them that the highest scored bidder was selected to conduct the classification and compensation study.

In November 2013, Fox Lawson & Associates was awarded the contract to conduct the Judicial Council's classification and compensation study. Four meetings were held with Fox Lawson & Associates, members of the Human Resources (HR) staff, and the Executive Office to establish the specifics of the study, including methodology, timeline, and a review of the current classification and compensation system at the Judicial Council.

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

In December 2013, communications were sent to all Judicial Council staff informing them of the beginning of the study and outlining the requirements, including completing employee Position Description Questionnaires (PDQ), which were due in February 2014.

In April and May 2014, Fox Lawson completed meeting with approximately 20 occupational panels across Judicial Council offices and locations, and will be scheduling regular updates to brief the Executive Office.

In June 2014, the Judicial Council Human Resources office and Fox Lawson discussed the current progress of the study with the council. Fox Lawson also began a series of one-on-one phone interviews with a small number of employees. The purpose was to clarify specific information provided in the PDQs regarding essential duties.

In July 2014, the Executive Office held all-staff meetings to update Judicial Council staff about the progress of the study and discussed the selected comparator markets.

In August 2014, Fox Lawson met with the Internal Chairs and the Executive Office to discuss recommendations for the proposed classification structure. The Internal Chairs and the Executive Office briefed the Judicial Council in closed session.

In September 2014, Fox Lawson took steps to draft classification specifications and finalized job description summaries for market survey.

In October 2014, Fox Lawson continued to draft and finalize the classification specifications and initiated the market survey to begin the compensation phase of the study.

All-staff meetings were held in November 2014 to communicate the current status of the Classification and Compensation Study. During the meeting, employees were provided with an overview of the new classification system and were given information on the appeals process.

To allow for sufficient time to consider all information and ensure that the classification specifications meet organizational needs and core services, the Executive Team has extended the timeline for staff allocations. Staff were informed of their new classifications by March 2015. This reflects a change from the original allocation date of February 2015.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

The Classification & Compensation Study is scheduled to be adopted by the Judicial Council mid-calendar year 2015; based upon the direction provided by the Judicial Council, the Executive Office will implement the plan accordingly and will periodically update and consult with the E&P committee as needed.

An implementation update will be provided at the October 2015 council meeting. The classification portion of the Fox Lawson study has provided a new and streamlined classification structure for the organization that has reduced the classifications from 184 classifications to approximately 72 classifications with approximately 19 pay bands.

Council Directive 20

E&P also recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to assess the results of the compensation and classification studies to be completed and propose organizational changes that take into account the SEC recommendation 7-75 and the analysis of the classification and compensation studies.

SEC Recommendation 7-75

The Administrative Director should make an AOC-wide assessment to determine whether attorneys employed across the various AOC divisions are being best leveraged to serve the priority legal needs of the organization and court users.

TASK

<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: On August 21, 2015 the JCC completed its Classification and Compensation Study that resulted in the implementation of a new salary structure for the organization. Review of the Attorney classifications determined that staff within the Center for Judicial Education and Research, Legal Services, and the Center for Families, Children & the Courts were appropriately allocated as attorneys. Based on the work performed, two classifications were established (Attorney I and Attorney II) based on the scope and criticality of the work to the organization.

On August 21, 2015 the JCC completed a Classification and Compensation Study, conducted by Fox Lawson, that resulted in the implementation of a new salary structure for the organization. The compensation phase of the project followed the classification portion of the study that began in December 2013 and ended in March of 2015, when JCC staff received their new classification specifications.

As a result of the Classification and Compensation Study, all Judicial Council jobs classified as Attorney were reviewed. Fox Lawson determined that staff within the Center for Judicial Education and Research (CJER), Legal Services, and the Center for Families, Children & the Courts were appropriately allocated as attorneys.

It was also determined by Fox Lawson that the Decision Band Method rating of the work performed by the Legal Services office was of a broader scope and criticality to the organization. Therefore, Fox Lawson developed a single level classification of attorney (Attorney II) that is applicable to the work performed by those attorneys within Legal Services and select jobs within the Center for Families, Children & the Courts. Additionally, Fox Lawson determined that the work performed by the CJER attorneys was at a lower level because the work performed was specific to the needs of CJER only and therefore, Fox Lawson developed a single level classification of attorney (Attorney I) that is only applicable to the work performed by those attorneys within CJER. Furthermore, the classification of attorney was removed from the Government Affairs as Fox Lawson determined that the work performed did not require an incumbent to be an attorney.

Council Directive 21

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at minimum, a collaborative planning process that requires an analysis of impacts on the judicial branch at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.

SEC Recommendation 6-2

The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at minimum, a collaborative planning process that requires an analysis of impacts on the judicial branch at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.

x	COMPLETED: In August 2013, Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

PENDING IMPLEMENTATION

The directive implementation will remain ongoing as this tool will be used as necessary whenever there are projects or initiatives that meet the requirements for use of this cost benefit analysis form.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators

Attachment A

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

ANALYSIS: Principles and Practices for DOF Analysts

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

And the final question upon completing an analysis should always be: "Does this make sense?"

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

Attachment B

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive    22

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the AOC to renegotiate or terminate, if possible, its lease in Burbank. The lease for the Sacramento North spaces should be reviewed and, if possible, renegotiated to reflect actual usage of the office space. The AOC should explore lower cost lease options in San Francisco, recognizing that the State Department of General Services would have to find replacement tenants for its space.

SEC Recommendation    10-1

The AOC should renegotiate or terminate its lease in Burbank. The lease for the Sacramento North spaces should be reviewed and renegotiated to reflect actual usage of the office space. The AOC should explore lower cost lease options in San Francisco, recognizing that DGS would have to find replacement tenants for its space.

- PENDING
- COMPLETED: The implementation of cancellations, terminations, contractions, renegotiations, relocations, and subleases of Judicial Council office space has resulted in rent reductions for the organization.

As reported in October 2012, the following lease transactions and exercised options have been completed (by location):

- Sacramento North: lease cancellation option exercised at 2880 Gateway Oaks Blvd.; leases at 2850 and 2860 Gateway Oaks Blvd. renegotiated mid-term; lease cancellation option exercised on fourth floor lease at 2850 Gateway Oaks Blvd.
- Burbank: 11,992 SF of space on first floor sublet; lease to be terminated by electing not to exercise renewal option.
- San Francisco: several lower cost options in San Francisco's Civic Center and Financial districts were identified. Depending upon which points in time are used for comparison purposes, comparable lease space in the same submarket of San Francisco was listed for 25% to 40% lower than the rate paid by the AOC to DGS in Fiscal Year (FY) 2011/12.

The AOC sought out potential interest from other state agencies to occupy a surplus of space equal to the 7th floor of the San Francisco building, approximately 38,575 SF. DGS did not permit the AOC to relinquish the space because the occupying agency we identified, the state Public Utilities Commission (PUC), requires the space only until December, 2015, when renovations to their current facility are scheduled to be completed. The AOC executed an interbranch agreement "subleasing" the 7th floor to the PUC. State-managed renovation projects of this magnitude often fall behind schedule, so PUC's occupancy of the 7th floor may continue into 2016.

In light of the recommendation from the California State Auditor in its January 2015 report, recommending that the council should conduct a thorough cost benefit analysis of moving its operations to Sacramento, council staff is gathering pertinent facilities, lease, human resources and market data. This will be completed in the second quarter of 2015.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

Implementation of the cancellations, terminations, contractions, renegotiations, relocations, and subleases resulted in a $1.52 million rent reduction through fiscal year 2012-2013, and approximately $2.35 million through fiscal year 2014-2015.

Chapter 10

Other Issues

This chapter presents a review of several additional issues, including lease costs and location of AOC facilities.

Leases

The AOC leases office space in San Francisco, Burbank, and Sacramento. The SEC has considered concerns that have been raised about the cost of the leases.

Background

The AOC conducts its business from four leased spaces, including its main offices in San Francisco, regional offices located in Burbank and Sacramento, and a separate office in Sacramento housing the Office of Governmental Affairs. The regional offices house staff from multiple AOC divisions.

San Francisco

The AOC occupies office space at 455 Golden Gate Avenue, San Francisco. BANCRO and the Judicial Council Conference Center are located in the building. The AOC occupies a portion of the first floor, all of the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh floors, and part of the eighth floor.

This office building at 455 Golden Gate Avenue is owned and operated by the State of California and managed by the Department of General Services (DGS). Apparently, there is no formal lease, as DGS has assigned the space to a governmental entity and assesses a fair market rental value<sup>1</sup>. This office space contains 207,845 square feet and is leased at $4.27<sup>2</sup> per square foot per month, and 10,655 square feet of storage space in the building is rented at a monthly rate of $1.43 per square. The lease amount is adjusted usually every fiscal year. The total annual lease costs for the leased office and storage space is $10,832,816.80<sup>3</sup>. There is no expiration date under the lease arrangement with DGS.

Moving from this office would be problematic, since the AOC most likely would be required to negotiate a release from DGS or find an acceptable sublessor to take over the leased space.

Burbank Lease

The Burbank facility is located at 2255 North Ontario Street. This office building is located near the Burbank Airport, with 37,347 square feet of office space over two floors. The first floor is occupied primarily by OCCM personnel.<sup>4</sup> The second floor is occupied primarily by SRO and CCMS personnel.<sup>5</sup>

The lease term is $3.17 per square foot per month.<sup>6</sup> There is an additional $100 per month cost for the first floor relating to the existing HVAC system. Annualized, the expense is $3.19 per square foot each month.<sup>7</sup> The lease rate for the second floor is $3.1827 per square foot each month.<sup>8</sup> The lease agreement specifies the annual lease cost is $459,203.28 for the first floor and $968,368.32 for the second floor.<sup>9</sup> The total annual lease cost for the Burbank facility is $1,427,571.60.<sup>10</sup> The lease cost for each floor increases to $3.28 per square foot as of June 1, 2012,<sup>11</sup> with one option to renew for an additional five-year term extending through June 30, 2018. There is a “no early termination” condition in the lease agreement. The current lease term ends June 30, 2013.

Sacramento

The downtown office space, occupied by the Office of Governmental Affairs, is located within walking distance of the State Capitol, at 770 L Street. This office space, referred to as the Sacramento-Central facility, comprises 6,578 square feet on one floor, occupied exclusively by OGA. In February 2012<sup>12</sup> the AOC renegotiated the lease and reduced the leased footage. The total annual lease cost for this lease space is $177,606<sup>13</sup>. The current lease term ends August 31, 2017. There is one three-year option to extend the lease, with the rental rate to be set at 95 percent of the fair market value as of the end of the initial lease term.

The North facilities consist of space located in two office buildings located at 2850 and 2860 Gateway Oaks, Sacramento. The lease of office space at 2850 Gateway Oaks consists of 36,368 square feet and is used by the Finance and TCAS divisions. The rental rate is $2.10 per square foot per month.<sup>14</sup> The current lease term ends July 31, 2016. There are two three-year options with rent at fair market value.

The leased office space at 2860 Gateway Oaks consists of 28,263 square feet and is occupied by NCRO and OCCM. The rental rate is $2.05 per square foot per month.<sup>15</sup> There are two three-year options with rent at fair market value. The combined annual lease cost for 2850 and 2860 Gateway Oaks is $1,611,743.40.<sup>16</sup> The lease for this space includes a credit for one month's rent and a $200,000 tenant improvement allowance, which was taken upfront as a rent credit during the 2011–2012 fiscal year.<sup>17</sup>

Previously, the AOC leased additional space at 2880 Gateway Oaks. That lease was terminated in May 2011.<sup>18</sup> AOC employees working at that office were relocated to the 2850 Gateway Oaks office building.<sup>19</sup> The leases for space at 2850 and 2860 Gateway Oaks were renegotiated,<sup>20</sup> resulting in a reduction of $0.49 per square foot for space at 2850 Gateway Oaks and $0.27 per square foot for space at 2860 Gateway Oaks.<sup>21</sup>

Discussion

The AOC spends more than $1,150,000<sup>25</sup> per month on leased office space — an annual total of $13,866,898<sup>26</sup> — plus an additional annual charge of $182,839.8<sup>27</sup> for storage space for its San Francisco space.

Additionally, it is apparent from site visits to the leased spaces that not all lease space is utilized. If recommendations for reducing staffing levels are followed, the need for leased space will decrease.<sup>32</sup>

AOC Headquarters Location

The AOC has operated from headquarters in San Francisco since 1961. Its offices are located in the same building as the California Supreme Court.

It is usual for most enterprises, public or private, to consider their costs of operation and location. Given the comparative lease costs discussed above, there is reason for the AOC to reevaluate its office locations, including its headquarters space in San Francisco. Such review should be part of the organization's long-term business planning. In this case, the considerations should include a consideration of costs and benefits, both economic and political.

From a strictly economic standpoint, lease costs are generally lower in Sacramento than San Francisco. Labor costs generally are lower as well. the AOC partly recognizes this through its geographic pay differential system, whereby some Sacramento region employees are paid 7 percent less than San Francisco-based employees performing the same type of work.

From a political standpoint, relocating AOC operations to Sacramento may be beneficial by placing the judicial branch administration closer to the Legislature, the executive branch, and governmental agencies. The importance of a strong political and legislative presence at the capital cannot be understated. Future success of the judicial branch in obtaining funding, and in advancing legislative goals, will be based partly on establishing strong relationships and credibility with legislators, legislative staff, and the Governor's Office. Access and interactions with key executive branch agencies, such as the Department of Finance, may be improved with AOC headquarters located in Sacramento.

One current legislative proposal would require all state agencies and the judicial branch to relocate their headquarters to Sacramento by 2025 (Assembly Bill 2501).

While no recommendation is offered concerning legislative proposals, possible relocation of AOC headquarters should be considered in the course of long-term planning for the judicial branch. That planning should be based on a cost-benefit analysis, taking into account economic, political, and other relevant factors.

Recommendations

The following recommendations are made regarding leases and location of operations.

Recommendation No. 10-1: The AOC should renegotiate or terminate its lease in Burbank. The lease for the Sacramento North spaces should be reviewed and renegotiated to reflect actual usage of the office space. The AOC should explore lower-cost lease options in San Francisco, recognizing that DGS would have to find replacement tenants for its space.<sup>33</sup>

Recommendation No. 10-2: As part of its long-term planning, the AOC should consider relocating its main offices, based on a cost-benefit analysis of doing so.

<sup>33</sup> In FY 11/12, the Sacramento North leases were negotiated mid-term for rent reduction. The AOC also exercised a termination option to relinquish a portion of the space under one lease, which will become effective in October 2012. The lease for the OGA office was renegotiated in FY 11/12 to contract the space mid-term. In FY 12/13, the AOC negotiated an Interagency Agreement with the California Public Utilities Commission for temporary occupancy of the entire 7th floor. In FY 12/13, the AOC entered into a sublease for a tenant to occupy the entire first floor of the Burbank office; upon the expiration of the lease, the office will move into a space that is approximately one-third of the current leased space.

Notes:

1. FY 2010/11 total AOC rent was $13,813,699 (SEC/JCC report uses $14,049,738 without reference dates; difference may be attributable to use of calendar or lease year versus fiscal year in this analysis).
2. Exercised option to terminate 2850 Gateway Oaks, 4th floor space effective 10/26/2012.
3. NCRO rent increases in FY 2012/13 due to majority portion of negotiated rent reduction taken in one month of FY 2012/13 and smaller annual reductions taken over balance of lease term.
4. OGA office relocated to smaller premises at lower negotiated rate in FY 2011/12; no ability further reduce and sublease portion of premises.
5. SRO 1st floor (11,992 SF) sublease and consent executed 6/15/2012; occupancy commenced 6/28/2012.
6. Assumes SRO Relocation to 11,328 SF upon 6/30/2013 lease expiration; prelim. headcount verified by Exec. Office May, 2012.
7. Agreement on business terms of assignment of San Francisco 7th floor to State Public Utilities Commission on 6/13/2012; MOU with DGS signed.
8. FY 2013/14 San Francisco rent estimated to increase 3% over FY 2012/13.
9. Tenant improvement expenses, if any, and brokerage commissions not included.
10. Previously-reported space and rent reduction in San Francisco no longer feasible due to increase in BCDC programmatic requirement.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive    23

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to identify legislative requirements that impose unnecessary reporting or other mandates on the courts and the AOC. Appropriate efforts should be made to revise or repeal such requirements.

Governmental Affairs continues to identify statutory requirements that impose unnecessary reporting or other mandates and, on behalf of and at the direction of the Judicial Council, advocate for revising and/or repealing such requirements. Governmental Affairs continues to work with Judicial Council staff to identify legislatively mandated reporting requirements for the Judicial Council, AOC and the courts that are unnecessary, outdated, or overly burdensome.

In 2012, Governmental Affairs worked with council divisions to identify several such reporting requirements. ## Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive 24

On August 9, 2012, E&P directed the interim Administrative Director of the Courts and incoming Administrative Director of the Courts to consider the SEC recommendations on AOC organizational structure (recommendations 5-1–5-6, 6-1) and present their proposal for an organizational structure for the consideration of the full Judicial Council at the August 31, 2012, council meeting.

SEC Recommendation 5-1

The AOC should be reorganized. The organizational structure should consolidate programs and functions that primarily provide operational services within the Judicial and Court Operations Services Division. Those programs and functions that primarily provide administrative services should be consolidated within the Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division. Other programs and functions should be grouped within an Executive Office organizational unit. The Legal Services Office also should report directly to the Executive Office but no longer should be accorded divisional status.

SEC Recommendation 5-2

The Chief Operating Officer should manage and direct the Judicial and Court Operations Services Division, consisting of functions located in the Court Operations Special Services Office; the Center for Families, Children and the Courts; the Education Office/Center for Judicial Education and Research; and the Office of Court Construction and Facilities Management.

SEC Recommendation 5-3

The Chief Administrative Officer should manage and direct the Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division, consisting of functions located in the Fiscal Services Office, the Human Resources Services Office, the Trial Court Administrative Services Office, and the Information and Technology Services Office.

SEC Recommendation 5-4

Other important programs and functions should be consolidated within an Executive Office organizational unit under the direction of a Chief of Staff. Those functions and units include such functions as the coordination of AOC support of the Judicial Council, Trial Court Support and Liaison Services, the Office of Governmental Affairs, the Office of Communications, and a Special Programs and Projects Office.

SEC Recommendation 5-5

The Chief Counsel, manager of the Legal Services Office (formerly the Office of the General Counsel) should report directly to the Administrative Director depending on the specific issue under consideration and depending on the preferences of the Administrative Director.

SEC Recommendation 5-6

The Chief Deputy Administrative Director position must be eliminated. If the absence of the Administrative Director necessitates the designation of an Acting Administrative Director, the Chief Operating Officer should be so designated.

SEC Recommendation 6-1

The Administrative Director, the Chief Operations Officer, the Chief Administrative Officer, and the Chief of Staff should be designated as the AOC Executive Leadership Team, the primary decision maker for the organization.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive    25

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require immediate compliance with the requirements and policies in the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual, including formal performance reviews of all employees on an annual basis; compliance with the rules limiting telecommuting; and appropriate utilization of the discipline system.

SEC Recommendation    6-3

The AOC Executive Leadership Team must order immediate compliance with the requirements and policies in the AOC personnel manual, including formal performance reviews of all employees on an annual basis; compliance with the rules limiting telecommuting; and appropriate utilization of the discipline system.

x	COMPLETED: Judicial Council Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual has been reviewed for compliance and specifically policies on telecommuting, performance management, and at-will employment have been developed, amended and/or expanded for implementation.

Following the council’s directive to ensure compliance with the requirements and policies in the Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual, the Administrative Director tasked Human Resources to amend existing policies and incorporate, where necessary, measures for tracking and reporting on compliance efforts.

When the regular telecommuting program policy (8.9) was approved by the Council on April 24, 2014, the new telecommuting policy included an application, review, and annual reporting process as well as clear guidelines for participation. The program continues to be fluid; in 2015, additional modifications were made to the ad hoc component to include performance measures for staff participating in an ad hoc telecommuting arrangement—requiring supervisors to monitor staff’s ad hoc productivity and accomplishments via a work log.

Similar measures were implemented for the performance management program. Shortly after the policy’s (3.9) amendment on October 10, 2013, performance reviews were implemented organization wide on April 1, 2014, and specific schedules were outlined for managers and supervisors to complete their employees’ initial reviews. Furthermore, the amended policy included a centralized review process in which managers and supervisors were asked to submit all performance management documentation to an assigned human resources representative prior to meeting with the employee and after the meeting took place.

Since the Judicial Council is recognized as an at-will employer and does not utilize progressive discipline to address performance issues, Policy 3.9 was expanded even further. The amended policy 3.9 also included the development of a performance improvement plan (PIP), which was intended as a tool for managers and supervisors to provide employees an opportunity to address performance issues. Through this process, progress toward addressing performance deficiencies is measured within a defined timeframe. If goals are not completed and performance does not improve, the Judicial Council has the authority to terminate employment at any time.

This process continues to be utilized--since July 2013, Human Resources has worked with offices to develop PIPs for six employees.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

Given that policies and procedures will always need to be reviewed for updates and applicability, this directive will be ongoing as a regular human resources business practice.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

Performance Reviews:

All 706 council employees are required to have a performance review. As of March 2015, 78% of the employees have received their performance evaluation with the goal of 100% by the end of the first full year of the program which is April 30, 2015.

In June of 2015 the council will receive a report providing status on the percentage of council staff that have received a performance review in the first year.

Telecommute Program:

Since the telecommute pilot was approved and policy modified, there are fewer people telecommuting. HR reports that 69 people telecommuted the first year; this year 76 people telecommute which is a drop of 30 from the original count of 98 telecommuters prior to the updated policy.

The annual report to council will be provided at the April 2015 Council meeting

Employee Discipline:

Since the implementation of the performance review program, the organization has implemented 6 performance improvement plans representing less than 1% of the 706 council employees.

OTHER INFORMATION

Staff will return to the council in June of 2015 to report on the percentage of performance reviews conducted during the first year of performance reviews.

An annual report on the Telecommute program will be provided to the council at the April 2015 council meeting.

PERFORMANCE MANAGEMENT PROCESS GUIDELINES

The purpose of the Performance Management Process is to support and enhance the long-term success of the organization and its employees. The process focuses on involving supervisors and employees in identifying meaningful performance expectations that support the organization's goals, recognize individuals' contributions, and foster continuous development of employees. The planning and review process is designed to facilitate communication between supervisors and employees. A sample Performance Plan and Review Form is attached to these guidelines for reference.

OVERVIEW OF THE PROCESS

The process begins by planning and defining performance expectations for the upcoming plan period. The supervisor and employee meet to develop an annual performance plan by reviewing the performance factors and expectations necessary to successfully perform the employee's job duties as stated in the job description. As further defined below, performance factors reflect the skills necessary in order to successfully perform the job. Performance factors and specific tasks should be modified to reflect the employee's particular responsibilities. Key objectives, major goals or special assignments should be identified for each performance factor.

The supervisor and employee also create a development plan by identifying action steps that the employee will take to develop and/or enhance his/her job-related knowledge, skills, and abilities. The Annual Performance Plan and Review Form shall be utilized to record the planning and performance review process.

Throughout the planning and development cycle, the supervisor and employee should meet periodically to review progress and update expectations as needed. The planning cycle ends with an overall review of results accomplished during the previous year. Each cycle should last for one year from the date of initiation. However, plans may be adjusted throughout the year to reflect accomplishments, completed projects or areas needing improvement. A Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) may be initiated at any time to identify critical areas needing immediate improvement.

It is the responsibility of the employee's supervisor, manager and office leadership to ensure that all plans and reviews are completed and submitted to the Human Resources Services Office on a timely basis.

ANNUAL PERFORMANCE PLAN AND REVIEW

Development of Initial Plan

The process begins with the development of an initial performance review plan. Plan development can occur when a new employee is hired, when a job classification changes or when an individual transfers to a new unit. The initial plan should consist of a discussion, expectation setting and the development of anticipated duties, projects or goals.

Feedback Periods

It is expected that supervisors will provide feedback to the employee during each review period. The supervisor should reinforce the positive work habits and provide constructive feedback on improving areas where further development is necessary.

Prior to Annual Review

In the month before the formal annual review, the supervisor should provide the employee with an Employee Self-Assessment form [hyperlink]. This form will allow employees to provide comments on their own performance during the past year. This is an informal document that the supervisor will consider when completing the annual review.

Annual Assessment Meeting

Within a month of each employee's annual review date, it is expected that every supervisor will meet with the employee and conduct an interactive meeting where the supervisor will conduct the Annual Review. At the conclusion of the meeting the employee will be asked to sign the review to verify that the review took place. By signing, the employee is not agreeing to the contents of the review, but that the review was conducted.

During the review meeting, if the employee provides new information that may result in modifications to the review; the supervisor may make any desired changes and schedule a follow-up meeting with the employee prior to finalizing the annual review. The follow-up meeting would then take place and the employee would be asked to sign the revised review.

Rebuttal Period

If an employee disagrees with the supervisor's review, he or she may prepare a rebuttal. This rebuttal should be submitted to the supervisor no later than ten business days from the date the employee received the performance review. The employee's rebuttal should be attached to the review and both documents will be placed in the employee's personnel file.

Completing the Annual Performance and Plan Review

1. Performance Factors

To complete the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form, the supervisor and employee should first review and discuss the performance factors described on the plan. Performance factors should reflect the most significant work responsibilities for the employee during the planning period under consideration.

In preparing the plan, supervisors and employees should review the Professional Skills section. Each area is available for selection through the drop-down menu - when a skill is selected, a descriptor for that skill will appear in the selected area. Supervisors will then determine if the individual “exceeds expectations,” “meets expectations,” or “needs improvement” in each of the selected areas. Please note that, for areas such as punctuality, an “exceeds expectations” is not appropriate since it is a basic job expectation arrive to work as assigned. Any performance factors or specific tasks listed in the drop down menu that are not currently performed and will not be performed during the review period should not be identified.

Each area listed below is available for review. An employee review may include all these areas, but should contain no less than five of the areas listed:

- Technical and Professional Expertise
- Problem Solving
- Computer Skills
- Time Management
- Written Communications
- Verbal Communication
- Initiative
- Setting High Standards
- Relationship Building
- Customer Services
- Organizational Skills
- Punctuality

Additional performance factors and tasks should be added to the employee’s plan if the listed factors do not adequately represent the employee’s responsibilities.

2. Employee Development: Duties, Projects or Goals

The second, more specific area of the review process is the Duties, Projects or Goals section. In this section the supervisor and employee should identify duties, projects or goals anticipated to be developed or completed during the next year. When considering an appropriate area to identify, supervisors may consider the following areas:

- Base load/ongoing work
- Time-limited assignments
- Multi-year projects with current milestones
- Special projects and assignments
- Job skills and development expectations
- Organizational skills, communication skills, and working relations
- Supervision, leadership and direction
- Reliability/punctuality (included for non-exempt classifications)

When identifying a duty, project or goal, try to be as specific as possible in the description of the item in the descriptor box. During the initial discussion regarding the performance and development plan, the employee and supervisor should discuss how the factors will be evaluated and weighted.

3. Measuring Performance

Each performance factor should be an accurate reflection of the employee's performance during the past year. If there is an area where the employee has generally performed well, but has worked through a few rough patches during the year, the rating of "meets expectations" may be appropriate. However, in the comments section, any issues that occurred during the review period should be noted.

Performance on duties, projects or goals should be rated based on the individual performance of that individual during the review period. Key indicators could be:

- Work Performed: Quantity, quality, and effectiveness of work, including accuracy, thoroughness, and consistency; time management, meeting deadlines, and compliance with policies and rules.
- Job Knowledge and Ability: Job-specific knowledge, skills and abilities; problem identification, analysis, and resolution; decision making; the ability to learn, retain, and apply instructions, policies, and other information.
- Adherence to timelines: Were projects or other measurable items delivered in a reasonable timeframe at an acceptable level of quality?
- Working Relationships: When completing the project, duty or goal, did the individual work cooperatively with other members of the team or with other stakeholders?

The comment section of the review plan is extremely important for the duties, projects or goals section of the review. Comments should be made in any section where a rating has been reflected. However, managers and supervisors should place special emphasis on areas which received an "exceeds expectations" or "needs improvement" rating. If an individual has been rated as “exceeds expectations,” list a reason why that rating was provided, cite an example that provides the employee, as well as future supervisors, with the skill or performance that led to this rating. If the employee was rated as “needs improvement,” cite reasons why this rating was provided and give clarifying guidelines on what is needed for improvement. Please keep in mind that this tool is utilized to provide feedback to an employee with the goal of ensuring that all individuals are successful in their job duties.

FEEDBACK DURING THE ANNUAL REVIEW PERIOD

Supervisors should give employees feedback about their performance on an ongoing basis. At a minimum, supervisors should discuss the performance and development plan with the employee after six months. The supervisor and employee should review the employee’s progress toward meeting his or her performance goals. This discussion also provides an opportunity for the supervisor to recognize the employee’s progress to date, as well as to offer direction where needed. Changing business conditions may warrant revising plans and objectives.

PERFORMANCE IMPROVEMENT PLANS

When an employee is experiencing difficulty in either a specific area or in overall performance, the development of a Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) may be implemented to provide the employee with guidance and clear expectations for performance improvement.

The PIP should identify areas of performance needing improvement and strategies on how that improvement could be achieved. The PIP should also identify a timeline of when performance improvement is expected to occur. Failure to demonstrate improvement either during the PIP or at the review date could result in disciplinary action up to and including the possibility of termination.

Issuance of a PIP does not in any way alter the at-will employment status, nor does the timeline for anticipated improvement imply an employment contract.

Contents: (A) Employee Performance Management Program
(B) Employee Performance Management Cycle
(C) Performance Improvement Plan

(A) Employee Performance Management Program

The performance management program functions as a method to advance AOC operational objectives while recognizing employee achievements and contributions to the AOC. Managing employee performance is an ongoing communication process between a supervisor and an employee. The communication process is a cycle that includes clarifying expectations, identifying and setting goals, providing feedback, and evaluating performance. Overseeing employee performance and providing feedback is not an isolated event, rather it is an ongoing cycle that occurs throughout the year.

(B) Employee Performance Management Cycle

The employee performance management cycle consists of three phases: planning, feedback, and assessment.

Planning

Supervisors will develop an annual performance plan, using the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form [hyperlink], to direct employees toward achieving specific goals that support the AOC's operational objectives and the employees' professional success. At a minimum, every employee at the AOC will be evaluated on an annual basis, using the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form.

Supervisors must communicate with employees regarding their performance expectations throughout the year. Supervisors and employees should collaborate on developing performance goals and expectations. Early planning to achieve goals, together with mutual communication, pave the path to a successful working relationship.

Guidelines for Determination of the Annual Performance Plan and Setting an Assessment Meeting:

1. The date of the employee's last step increase will be the designated date for the annual assessment meeting.
2. If the employee's step increase date changes, the new step increase date will become the new evaluation and planning date.
3. If the employee's job classification changes and more than 180 days have passed since the last performance review date, the annual performance plan from the past job classification will be completed by the past supervisor and a new performance plan will be initiated by the new supervisor.
4. If the employee's job classification changes and less than 180 days have passed since the last performance review date, a new performance plan will be initiated by the new supervisor utilizing appropriate information from the past performance review plan.
5. If the employee's supervisor changes during the annual review period, but the job classification has not changed, the new supervisor will be responsible for completing the annual performance review and may consider feedback from the prior supervisor. The new supervisor shall meet with the employee to clarify expectations and may revise the performance plan to meet the needs of the employee's new assignment.

Feedback

Once the performance plan is in place, supervisors are responsible for initiating and providing periodic feedback to employees regarding their job performance. Employees may also request feedback on their performance from their supervisors at any time.

While AOC policy states that employee performance should be formally assessed once a year, it is strongly recommended that employees receive a verbal or written performance assessment and feedback on a more frequent basis. Supervisors should acknowledge employee accomplishments or address needs for improved performance as often as necessary. Feedback should be specific to reinforce positive results or provide guidance in areas that need improvement. Supervisors should utilize collaboration, coaching and feedback to ensure that employees achieve positive outcomes.

Assessment

At the end of the annual performance period, the employee's performance is measured against goals established through the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form in the prior year. This annual assessment meeting is an opportunity for supervisors to communicate with employees regarding their performance over the past year, evaluate employees' job satisfaction, and make plans for employees' performance goals.

At the conclusion of the assessment meeting, the supervisor will ask the employee to sign and date the form that summarizes the employee's performance over the prior year. The supervisor will explain to the employee that the signature acknowledges the contents of their discussion, but is not necessarily an agreement with the supervisor's assessment. Afterwards, the supervisor routes the document to office leadership for final signatures, provides a copy of the signed form to the employee, and sends a copy to the assigned Pay and Benefits Specialist for placement in the employee's personnel file.

(C) Performance Improvement Plan

An employee who is experiencing performance challenges may be placed on a Performance Improvement Plan ("PIP") [hyperlink] with the goal of identifying areas of improvement as well as guiding the employee to improved performance.

The PIP contents will communicate to the employee: (1) specific areas of work performance that are below expected standards, (2) a plan for improving the employee's work performance, (3) a time frame within which the employee is expected to make improvements, and (4) possible consequences should the employee fail to raise his/her performance to meet the expected standards.

The purpose of the PIP is to inform the employee that certain deficiencies have been detected and to give the employee an opportunity to correct or improve their work performance before further action is taken.

Pilot Program
Number: 8.9

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program

Contact: Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division, Human Resources Services Office

Program
Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this pilot program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this pilot program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This pilot program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this pilot program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this pilot program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work Pilot Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work

(1) Applicability

Only non-supervisory AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable pilot program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work
How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously.

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the pilot program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee's review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (excluding supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot "make up" missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an "ad hoc" basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee's office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this pilot program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

"Ad hoc" remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an "ad hoc" basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on a monthly report that will be submitted to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee's primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. \(Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)\). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this pilot program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this pilot program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the Remote Work Application form (Attachment II) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

Recognizing the benefits of telecommute programs, legislation at the federal level and in the state of California encourages telecommute programs for government employees in positions where telecommuting is viable.<sup>1</sup>

The Administrative Director of the Courts recommends that the Judicial Council consider and select one of four options concerning telecommuting for employees of the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC).

Recommendation

The options presented for consideration by the Judicial Council are as follows:

1. Approve the pilot program as a regular telecommute program, with the current additional controls for approving, monitoring, and rescinding participation;

2. Extend the current pilot telecommute program an additional year;
3. Eliminate regular telecommuting and allow only limited, ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or
4. Eliminate all forms of telecommuting.

The Administrative Director of the Courts recommends that the Judicial Council approve Option 1: to remove the pilot restriction from the program and retain the additional controls put in place by the Executive Office. These additional controls are as follows:

- Employees who serve in a lead capacity may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis (managers and supervisors were already precluded from participating);
- Employees working part time may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis;
- Employees requiring general supervision may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis;
- The Administrative Director has the discretion to suspend the use of regular and ad hoc remote work assignments at any time;
- Renewals must be made annually and approved by the Administrative Director before the commencement of the remote work schedule; and
- At the conclusion of the classification and compensation study, the Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) will conduct an additional review of participation to ensure consistency with any recommendations made as a result of the study.

Previous Council Action

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council directed the Administrative Director to ensure that the AOC was consistently adhering to its existing policy on telecommuting (working remotely) (Policy 8.9, AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures; Attachment A), and to identify and correct any deviation from or violation of the existing policy.

On December 14, 2012, the council further directed the Administrative Director to review the original policy and make recommendations on any proposed amendments.

The council subsequently asked the Administrative Director to consider alternatives to telecommuting, including whether telecommuting should be eliminated, and to return with a report and recommendations for council consideration at its February 2013 meeting.

In the February 2013 report (Attachment B), the Judicial Council was presented with and considered the following options:

1. To eliminate all forms of telecommuting;
2. To eliminate regular telecommuting and allow only limited, ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or

3. To permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, including controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation.

The council approved Option 3 as a 12-month pilot program. The program was implemented, allowing employees authorized by the Administrative Director to work remotely when consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions. As a part of the pilot program, the council also approved the use of ad hoc remote work arrangements, limited to no more than two workdays per month, in the event of unforeseen business or personal needs (Pilot Telecommute Program Policy; Attachment C).

The council requested that an interim report on program implementation be prepared for the Executive and Planning Committee after six months (Attachment D), and a full report after one year, to enable the council to identify a course of action.

Rationale for Recommendation

Following council approval of the pilot program, the Executive Office added the additional controls to ensure consistent and equitable application of the policy. With these controls in place, and based on the monitoring process implemented, the AOC has demonstrated that a remote work program can be effectively and efficiently implemented in a manner that supports employees in the performance of their duties without any negative impacts on customers or colleagues. A summary of the changes to the policy is provided in Attachment E.

The regular program

Defined eligibility requirements for regularly scheduled remote work. The original telecommute policy allowed for up to eight days of telecommuting per month, and provided each office leader with discretion to make exceptions to the policy. In 2012, 98 employees (including supervisors and managers) participated in the program, representing a total of 454 remote work days per month.

Under the pilot program initiated in 2013, a structural control limiting telecommuting to one day per week was established to address any question of a diminution in service to customers. The Executive Office determined that in addition to management staff, part-time employees, employees acting in a senior or lead capacity, and employees requiring general supervision would not be permitted to participate because the primary essential duties of their positions required their on-site presence at the workplace.

Exactly 109 applications were received. Using the revised criteria for participation, 69 employees were approved to telecommute regularly one day per week. The current number of employees participating in the program has dropped from the original 69 to 65, for a total of 260 remote workdays per month. This figure represents a 33 percent reduction in the number of participants from 2012, and a 42 percent reduction in the total number of telecommute days per month.

Approximately 40 percent of applications were denied. Unsuccessful applicants were informed of the reasons for denial. Additional information concerning eligibility was communicated to all employees.

Table 1 reflects changes in the number of telecommuting employees since 2012.

Table 1. Change in Number of Telecommuting Employees

Total	98	454	65	260

Note: Offices without employees participating in regularly scheduled telecommuting are not included.

Use of work logs. The original telecommute policy did not require work logs. The pilot program does. The work log lists the duties performed and work produced while an employee works remotely. Under the pilot program, work logs are submitted to the employee’s supervisor for review and approval, and subsequently to the Human Resources Services Office (HRSO). Work logs are audited by the HRSO to ensure that the duties performed while telecommuting are appropriate and sufficient for a full day’s work and consistent with the pilot program.

The most common remote tasks reported include:

- Reviewing documents and researching and analyzing data (project-based work, legal research, and data collection);
- Preparing projects (presentations, timeline development, and curriculum development);
- Responding to communications (e-mail and phone);
- Participating in conference calls;
- Writing and editing reports; and
- Performing duties specific to particular offices and positions.

HRSO contacts individual supervisors with questions or concerns regarding the content of the work log or the duties/tasks performed. Commonly asked questions are as follows:

1. Is the nature of work consistent with the business needs of the AOC?
2. Is the employee effectively managing time?
3. Is the employee's work satisfactory and timely?
4. Has there been a reduction in quantity of work produced?

Supervisors and managers with participants in the pilot program reported satisfaction with both the quality and the quantity of work carried out during the remote work periods. Work logs have been effective in supporting program monitoring and adherence to high service standards.

The ad hoc program

Tracking and reporting. The ad hoc telecommute program is a separate component of the pilot program, offering employees the ability to work remotely no more than two days per month when extenuating circumstances arise. It is available only to employees who do not participate in the regular pilot telecommute program.

Before the pilot program, instances of ad hoc telecommuting were not accounted for, and the AOC lacked a methodology to assess and determine usage. There were no restrictions on the number of ad hoc days an employee could be approved to take, effectively creating a situation that could be employed to distort the original regular telecommuting rule. According to the SEC report, this freedom led to instances in which some employees worked in their AOC offices only infrequently. Regular telecommute program participants could also seek additional telecommute days through the ad hoc process. Since the pilot program was established, HRSO receives monthly ad hoc telecommuting data from each office and reviews it for trends or areas of concern. Table 2 below details the use of ad hoc telecommuting, by office, between March 2013 and January 2014.

Table 2. Ad Hoc Telecommuting, by Office

Total	36	396

Note: Offices that did not have employees telecommuting on an ad hoc basis are not included.

The average ad hoc telecommuting usage among the entire AOC for this period was 36 days per month, representing less than one percent of staff work time. (This figure does not account for ad hoc days resulting from the special events outlined below.)

Expanded management toolkit in addressing three disruptive events. The level of flexibility afforded by the ad hoc telecommute program provided a valuable management tool during three major commute-related special circumstances that affected the Bay Area: two transit strikes and a bridge closure.

BART strikes. In July 2013, and again in October 2013, Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) employees went on strike, shutting down one of the main public transportation services for staff commuting to and from the San Francisco office. The Executive Office authorized employees directly affected by the strike to telecommute on an ad hoc basis the first two days of the BART closure. The exception also applied to employees participating in the regular pilot telecommute program to shift one of their telecommute days to the week of the strike; however, no employee was allowed to telecommute more than two days during that week. Employees were also allowed to use a flexible work schedule (earlier start and end times) or accrued leave as permitted by business need and with supervisor approval.

Bay Bridge closure. In September 2013, the Bay Bridge was closed pending the opening of its new eastern span. The closure was expected to create heavy traffic and congested public transit. During this period, the Executive Office provided employees with options that would meet the work needs of the agency while trying to alleviate commuting challenges. These options included:

- Allowing up to two ad hoc telecommute days for those employees not participating in the regular pilot program;
- Shifting a regular telecommute day to a day when the bridge was closed;
- Having a flexible work schedule to avoid heavy commute periods; and
- Using available leave accruals to take time off during impacted days.

Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that employees who worked remotely during these days had sufficient assignments for the full period. Employees who participated in any of the special-circumstance days were required to submit to their supervisors a remote work log, which was, in turn, submitted to HRSO.

Prior to implementation of the new pilot program, in instances where such special circumstances occurred, office heads had the discretion to offer commute options for their respective offices. Since the implementation of the pilot program, the Executive Office instead establishes consistent, agencywide commute alternatives that include both telecommuting and non-telecommuting options.

Ad hoc remote usage rates during the BART strikes and the Bay Bridge closure are illustrated in table 3.

Comments, Alternatives Considered, and Policy Implications

With the implementation of and strict adherence to guidelines during the pilot year, and with continued oversight and monitoring by the HRSO under the direction of the Administrative Director, four options are presented for consideration by the council.

Option 1: Adopt as an ongoing program the pilot telecommute policy, including the additional controls put in place during the implementation of the pilot program.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, the “pilot” terminology would be removed from the policy. Participation would still be based on the fiscal year cycle, and employees would reapply annually to ensure that job duties are still appropriate to telecommuting.

The telecommute program would continue to be implemented through a centralized process managed by the HRSO. This process involves a review of each new application by office leadership using the following parameters:

1. Nature of Work. What is the type of work being performed by the employee, and is the telecommuting arrangement conducive to the duties necessary to perform the work?
2. Quantity of Work. Can a sufficient number of work activities be performed at home?
3. Quality of Work. Has the employee demonstrated an ability to carry out high-quality work with minimal supervision?

4. Timeliness. Has the employee consistently shown that he or she is able to work within established deadlines?
5. Ability to handle multiple priorities. Has the applicant demonstrated a strong ability to manage multiple, competing priorities?

Once office leadership completes its initial review, a recommendation is made to the HRSO. HR then conducts a second review of each application against these same parameters, as well as the following additional criteria:

1. Current division and unit balance. What is the requested telecommute day, and do other employees in the office also telecommute on that day? If so, what is the potential impact to scheduling and workload?
2. Ability to handle scheduled and unexpected leaves. Will the office have coverage in times of scheduled days off or unexpected absences?
3. Performance Improvement Plan (PIP). Is the employee currently on a PIP? Has the employee had past performance issues?

The HRSO then forwards its review and recommendation to the Administrative Director for a final decision on participation

See Proposed Policy 8.9, Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Program; Attachment F.

Option 2: Extend the current pilot program for an additional year.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, the pilot program would be extended for one year, with further review by the Judicial Council in April 2015. All current controls would remain in place, and all interested employees would need to resubmit applications before current participant agreements end on June 30, 2014.

Option 3: Eliminate regular telecommuting and allow only limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, regular telecommuting would no longer be permitted at the AOC. However, to allow for management flexibility in special circumstances, the Administrative Director would have discretion to allow employees to telecommute on an ad hoc basis with the approval of their supervisors or managers and office leadership.

Option 4: Eliminate all forms of telecommuting.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, telecommuting on a regular and an ad hoc basis would no longer be permitted at the AOC. Such a decision could present employee retention issues, in that the agency would be unable to offer comparable employee benefits in a competitive labor market. Further, elimination of the program could also affect employee morale and performance.

Should the council approve Option 1 or 2, amended job descriptions resulting from the classification and compensation study will be reviewed against the telecommuting criteria and could potentially change employee eligibility during 2014–2015.

Implementation Requirements, Costs, and Operational Impacts

Implementation of the pilot telecommute program is centralized under the oversight of HRSO; ultimate authority to approve or deny participation in the program rests with the Administrative Director of the Courts.

All regular pilot telecommuting schedules will conclude during the week of June 30, 2014. Should the program continue, employees wishing to participate in the program would be required to (re)submit applications. HRSO staff would review and submit the applications to the Administrative Director for final review and approval or denial. Approved employees would commence their one-day-per-week telecommute on a date approved by their supervisors.

Participating employees would be required to submit weekly logs describing work performed on telecommute days. A human resources analyst would expend approximately 24 hours per month tracking and documenting program usage, in addition to conducting initial reviews of any new applications.

Policy

Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program provides employees the opportunity to work from home when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the employee's division director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Applicability
- (C) Request and Approval Process
- (D) Remote Work Schedules
- (E) The Home Office
  - (1) Work Environment
  - (2) Office Equipment
  - (3) Information Security
  - (4) Health and Safety
- (F) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities
- (G) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

The AOC recognizes the potential management and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. This policy does not intend to cover employees working remotely due to work-related travel.

(B) Applicability

Only AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program.

(C) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the division director to approve or decline the request. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the division director. In making this determination, the division director will consider work-related criteria, including:

- The employee's job functions and feasibility of performing work away from the office;
- Degree of supervision required;
- The performance and work habits of the employee;
- Business needs, including work demands of the employee's unit; and
- Suitability of proposed home work environment.

A request to participate in the remote work program may be approved only when the division director determines that, while working remotely, the employee can perform all the duties and responsibilities of the position in a productive, efficient, and satisfactory manner that is consistent with the needs of the organization. Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Requests to work remotely as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor or the Human Resources Division, Integrated Disability Management Unit.

The Remote Worker's Agreement and Remote Work Checklist must be signed as indicated before remote working begins.

(D) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (including supervisors and managers) may be approved to work remotely as follows:

- During the first three months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After three months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work remotely up to a maximum of four days per month.
- After six successful months of participation in the remote work program, employees are eligible to request to work remotely up to a maximum of eight days per month.

Any exceptions to the above scheduling guidelines are at the discretion of the division director, in advance consultation with the Director of Human Resources. The remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(A\)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- Remote workers may request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working remotely.

- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day.

An employee may also be approved to work remotely on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs.

(E) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee’s primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working remotely. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Services Division does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working remotely.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Services Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working remotely. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(D\)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Services HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work remotely or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working remotely, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Division, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(F) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6, and AOC Computer Use Best Practices. In addition to AOC requirements on time reporting (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(D\)), remote workers may be required to submit work logs of time spent and work performed while working remotely, at the discretion of their supervisor.

(G) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this policy may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment.

The Remote Work Application should be discussed and renewed annually, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it is not in the best interests of the AOC or the employee.

Participation in the remote work program is approved based on specific criteria considered by the division director on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

The Administrative Director of the Courts requests that the Judicial Council consider and approve one of the following options concerning telecommuting. In addition, the Administrative Director confirms that all 85 telecommuting staff are currently in compliance with the existing policy and has prepared a report containing options for consideration by the Judicial Council. The report contains options to: (1) eliminate all forms of telecommuting; (2) eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or (3) permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, which contains controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation. If the revised telecommute policy is approved, a follow-up report will be provided to the Judicial Council in one year.

Previous Council Action

In August 2012, the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) recommended that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require compliance with the requirements and policies of the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual, including compliance with the rules limiting telecommuting, specifically concerning Policy 8.9 Working

Remotely (Telecommuting). As a response to that directive, the Administrative Director confirmed that all 85 telecommuting staff are in compliance with the existing policy and, in consultation with the AOC Executive Office and office directors, proposed amendments to the policy to address implementation and compliance concerns stated in a report presented by E&P to the council at its August 31, 2012, meeting.

At its December 2012 meeting, E&P further proposed an amendment to Judicial Council directive 26 to enlarge its scope to include the question of whether a telecommute program should remain in force. The proposed revisions to Policy 8.9 and options outlined in this report respond to the amended directive for discussion at the council’s February 2013 meeting.

Current Status

There are 85 regular employees in compliance with the current Policy 8.9 who have been approved for telecommuting within the AOC. The chart below lists the eight AOC offices that currently participate in the program.

Participating Offices	Count of Participating Employees	% of Total AOC Population
Center for Families, Children & the Courts	27	3.76%
Center for Judiciary Education and Research	11	1.53%
Court Operations Special Services Office	9	1.25%
Criminal Justice Court Services Office	3	.42%
Information Technology Services Office	19	2.65%
Judicial Council Support Services	1	.14%
Legal Services Office	11	1.53%
Trial Court Liaison Office	4	.56%
Grand Total	85	11.84%

The following ten offices do not currently participate in the regular telecommuting program.

Non - Participating Offices
Judicial Branch Capital Program Office	Office of Communications	Special Projects Office
Fiscal Services Office	Office of Governmental Affairs	Trial Court Administrative Services Office
Human Resources Services Office	Office of Security
Office of Administrative Services	Office of Real Estate & Facilities Management

Of the 718 regular employees only 85 regular employees have been approved to participate in the program, representing 11.84 percent of the AOC regular workforce. The remaining 633 regular employees work the standard workweek in an assigned AOC work location.

Duties approved for telecommuting

Office leadership have considered and approved regular telecommute schedules depending upon various job responsibilities, including performing legal research, drafting legal opinions, analyzing data, writing reports, and providing network support/administration. Examples of such duties/responsibilities include:

- Legal research to update legal publications, course curricula, and online courses
- Research, data analysis, and report writing connected with advisory committee or other group work
- Configuring, administering, and supporting network and server infrastructure
- Creating lesson plans, developing PowerPoint presentations, and meeting via phone with planning committees
- Writing content for online courses, writing scripts for broadcasts (for both judges and court staff), and drafting reports
- Writing, editing, and generating technical documents
- Preparing and reviewing grant applications, including the preparation of budget sheets and forecasts

Duties not approved for telecommuting

Not all employees have been deemed suitable to participate in the telecommute program due to the nature of the work assigned. Employees who have been deemed ineligible for a regular telecommute schedule include those whose job responsibilities require them to be present in the AOC offices. Examples of such duties/responsibilities include:

- Processing of daily Court-Appointed Counsel compensation claims (which requires specialized software and face-to-face interaction with Accounting staff)
- Handling daily intake of retired judge assignment requests (which requires access to specialized software and constant telephone access)
- Processing of payroll or benefit information (which requires restricted access to the State Controller's Office system) and employee relations interactions (which are best handled in a face-to-face meeting)
- Setting up new computers, delivering them to employees, repairing malfunctioning computers, and processing end-of-life equipment for reutilization/disposal
- Coordinating logistics for judicial education programs (which requires being available to a number of CJER staff)
- Managing the logistics of securing meeting rooms, lodging, and other requirements for education programs and meetings
- Hands-on consulting with other employees in specific subject matter areas, such as instructional design or WebEx support

Additional reasons why employees have not been allowed to telecommute include:

- Employees on a performance improvement plan who require supervision, assessment, and development on site
- Managers and supervisors who need to be available to their staff on as-needed basis

Options for Consideration and Policy Implications

Option 1: Eliminate all forms of telecommuting

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be eliminated and telecommuting, both on a regular schedule and on an ad hoc basis, would no longer be permitted in the AOC.

Benefits of adopting option 1

Improved perception/reputation. By eliminating all forms of telecommuting, AOC staff will be available at all times to assist their customers within the Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal, and the trial courts. The AOC has been under public scrutiny to reform and restructure its current practices/policies. Elimination of the telecommuting program enables the AOC to strengthen its reputation with the trial courts and the public.

Ability to supervise employees on site; employee availability. Under a telecommuting program not strictly managed and controlled by a centralized oversight group, there may be a perception of little to no supervision of employees on telecommuting arrangements. By eliminating this option, it eliminates this perception and thereby ensures that all employees on site are properly supervised by their supervisor or manager. Elimination of the telecommuting program will have AOC employees at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule, with the exception of the one day per month mandatory furlough.

Consistency with most written trial court policies. Most trial courts have not adopted a formal telecommute policy for their employees. Elimination of the policy places the AOC on equal terms with the trial courts and reduces the perception of unavailability.

All offices treated the same regardless of the nature of work. The wide latitude of telecommuting arrangements within the AOC, as allowed under the current Policy 8.9, has resulted in different applications of the policy across all offices. By eliminating the ability to telecommute, employees will be treated the same regardless of their duties and responsibilities.

Challenges of adopting option 1

Reduced motivation potentially leading to reduced performance. The ability to telecommute is a very important job benefit to those who participate in the program. Complete elimination of the program could result in less-motivated employees, which could have a direct effect on job performance and productivity.

Retention issues—potential for losing quality workforce. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for remote working. If the work from home program is eliminated, it could result in a loss of quality employees to competing employers. It could also influence future ability to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Employees will perceive this as another take-away. Over the past four years employees have endured several changes in the workplace that have been perceived by the employees as “take-aways.” While many changes have been a direct result of the economic downturn, others, such as this program, are “no-cost” benefits. Removing such a benefit would most likely be perceived by employees as yet another take-away, with a corresponding direct impact on employee morale.

Potential increased commute cost to employees. Employees who currently work remotely are relieved of the time and cost of commuting for the day(s) they work from home. For example, a commuter from the East Bay could save 45 minutes each way to and from work, as well as $6 to $10 per day in transportation costs. An individual participating in a one day per week remote work assignment would have an increased cost of $24 to $40 per month and will spend approximately 6 additional hours per month commuting.

Ability of the AOC to offer comparable employee benefits in the competitive San Francisco labor market. AOC HR contacted employers within the San Francisco Bay Area to determine what, if any, telecommuting programs they offer to their employees. Of the public entities contacted, the City and County of San Francisco, Superior Court of San Francisco County, San Francisco State University, and University of California, San Francisco offer some form of telecommuting. Of the private entities contacted, Adobe, Charles Schwab, Gap, Inc., and Yahoo! also offer some form of telecommuting. Based on information gathered, it appears that remote working has become a standard practice among major San Francisco employers and is a highly desired benefit of job seekers. To continue to be competitive in the San Francisco labor market, it is critical to develop and maintain programs that meet the business needs of the organization to attract and retain quality staff.

Option 2: Eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be revised to only allow for limited, ad hoc telecommuting not to exceed two days in any given month. In this option telecommuting would only be allowed under special circumstances that would meet the business needs of the AOC. For example, an individual who is on vacation at home and unable to come to the office is required to complete an unexpected project by close of business. That individual could be approved to work from home on that day so the project can be completed and the individual credited with the work time utilized.

Oversight of this option would be granted to office leadership, with monthly ad hoc telecommute reports submitted to the Human Resources Services Office for tracking and review. A quarterly utilization report would be provided to the Administrative Director.

Benefits of adopting option 2

Improved perception/reputation. Elimination of regular telecommuting and the restriction of the program to only include remote work on an ad hoc basis may reduce the negative perception of the AOC telecommuting program. This restriction of the telecommuting program enables the AOC to strengthen its reputation with the trial courts and the public.

Allows for flexibility in meeting critical business needs. While this option does not provide for a regularly scheduled work from home day, it does provide the AOC with the ability to approve limited, one-time, as-needed remote work that would meet a specific, critical business need.

Consistent with some trial court practices. While many trial courts do not have a formal written remote work policy, some trial courts do allow an ad hoc type of work from home program. Some trial courts have allowed staff to work from home to complete a report, a project, and research or data analysis in a quieter, less interrupted setting.

Challenges of adopting option 2

Negative perception/reputation. The AOC has been under public scrutiny to reform and restructure its current practices/policies. Allowing for even ad hoc telecommuting does not completely address the perception that the AOC is unavailable to address trial courts' needs in a timely fashion.

Reduced motivation leading to reduced performance (for individuals who have lost a regular telecommute schedule). The ability to telecommute is a very important job benefit to those who participate in the program. Elimination of the regular remote work program and replacing it with a much more restrictive ad hoc program could result in less-motivated employees and could have a direct effect on job performance and productivity.

Retention issues—potential for losing quality workforce. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for regular remote working. If the work from home program is reduced to an ad hoc program, it could result in a loss of quality employees to competing employers. It could also influence future ability to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Employees will perceive this as another take-away. Over the past four years employees have endured several changes in the workplace that have been perceived by the employees as “take-aways.” While many changes have been a direct result of the economic downturn, others, such as this program, are “no-cost” benefits. The severe restricting of such a benefit would likely be perceived by employees as yet another take-away potentially having a direct impact on employee morale.

Potential increased commute cost to employee. Employees who currently work remotely are relieved of the time and cost of commuting for the day(s) they work from home. For example, a commuter from the East Bay could save 45 minutes each way to and from work, as well as $6 to $10 per day in transportation costs. An individual participating in a one day per week remote work assignment would have an increased cost of $24 to $40 per month and will spend approximately 6 additional hours per month commuting.

Option 3: Permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, which contains controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation in the telecommute program

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be revised to the more restrictive policy outlined below.

The proposed Policy 8.9 contains a number of revisions that, if incorporated, address many of the concerns raised. For example, it narrows the scope of the telework policy to nonsupervisory positions, limits the number of days a person can utilize ad hoc or regular telecommuting, and prohibits a combination of ad hoc and regular telecommuting.

Further, to address accountability issues, it includes tracking procedures. AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work remotely. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Additionally, HR would provide a review of the application process and provide recommendations to the Administrative Director or designee for final consideration/approval. This process is designed to ensure that all participants meet and adhere to policy guidelines.

Comparison between current and proposed

The goal is to design a program that is in the best public interest and that benefits the employees, while addressing the challenges identified, i.e., how to measure productivity for the employees who work from home, how to determine what positions are suitable for telecommuting, and how to fairly implement the policy.

The chart below illustrates the differences between the current policy and the proposed policy:

Criteria	Current Policy	Proposed Policy
Employment eligibility	After 6 months of employment	After 12 months of employment
Limits definition of “Home” location	None	Restricts “Home” location to one in the state of California

Limits number of regularly scheduled telecommute days	Up to 8 days per month	No more than 1 day per week in any given week
Limits participation in regular remote work program	None	Limited to only nonsupervisory AOC employees
Limits participation in ad hoc telecommute days	None	Limited to 2 days per month in any given month; available to all AOC employees; not available to employees on a regular telecommute schedule
Consideration/review process	Office leadership discretion	1. Office leadership review, 2. Human Resources review, 3. Administrative Director/designee approval
Factors for approval consideration	Office leadership discretion	Defined consideration factors: 1. Nature of work, 2. Quantity of work, 3. Quality of work, 4. Timeliness, 5. Ability to handle multiple priorities
Approval authority	Office leadership approval	Administrative Director/designee approval
Allowable exceptions	Office leadership discretion	None (except for reasonable accommodations for a disability consistent with law)
Work logs maintained	None	Required for each regularly scheduled remote work day
Tracking of ad hoc telecommute days	None	Tracking required for each day of ad hoc remote work by office leadership and Human Resources
Frequency of productivity monitoring	Annually	Continuing duty of office leadership

The amended policy recognizes the potential benefits of an organized, managed remote work program, and the revisions reflect an emphasis on accessibility, transparency, and consistency. The final amended policy includes two key components that address these themes: availability of staff to address inquiries from internal customers, the courts, and the public; and the assignment of a centralized unit to oversee and manage the telework program.

Benefits of adopting option 3

Increased productivity. Overall productivity may be improved because the more desirable and attractive working conditions result in higher levels of employee motivation. A number of companies that have implemented telecommuting in the workplace have seen increased productivity in their employees.<sup>1</sup>

Work/life balance and employee motivation. Employees perceive the remote working opportunity as a workplace benefit. Employees appreciate and will recognize the efforts by the AOC to maintain attractive work benefits in a challenging economic time.

Work environment. The nature of work appropriate for remote working situations is best served in quiet, uninterrupted settings where quality thinking can occur. The lack of interruptions can not only expedite the completion of a project, but can also increase the quality of the finished product.

Increased monitoring. The utilization of work logs demonstrates the quality and quantity of work performed, which can potentially lead to an increase in productivity.

Employee retention and recruitment. Several employees have expressed that this “benefit” is an important aspect of their decision to be employed at the AOC. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for remote working. This option could allow the AOC to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Emulates state policies and legislation that encourage utilization of telecommute programs. Government Code section 14200.1(b): “It is the intent of the Legislature to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.” The standard template for telecommute policy utilized by the state agencies is provided on the Department of General Services website at: <http://www.dgs.ca.gov/dgs/ProgramsServices/telework.aspx>

Challenges of adopting option 3

Perception of monitoring, supervising, and evaluating off-site employees. Under any telecommuting program, there may be a perception of little to no supervision of employees on telecommuting arrangements. Telecommuting may make it more challenging to review the work product on a regular basis to ensure productivity standards are being met.

Limits face-to-face interaction/exchange of information. Working from home could reduce the interpersonal, collaborative relationships necessary for the development of a sound work product.

Impacts on non-telecommuting employees. If regular telecommuting is continued, the AOC will continue to have employees whose job responsibilities prohibit them from participation. For these employees there may be a perception of disparity.

Information on current telecommute practices, public and private

The Telework Research Network (TRN) is an independent consulting and research organization that publishes findings related to workplace flexibility. In June of 2011, the TRN published a report entitled The State of Telework in the U.S. (see Attachment D),<sup>2</sup> which integrates a large number of studies, surveys, and censuses to present the current state of telework in the United States. The report encompasses both the private and public sectors, as well as the resulting benefits of telework. According to the report, telecommuting is in much wider use in the private sector than in the public sector. However, use of telecommute (also referred to as telework) programs has increased in recent years in the public sector. A 2011 report also by TRN reviews the benefits and challenges of telecommuting in the California government workforce. While many of the cost-saving considerations would not apply to the AOC, the concept of remaining competitive and attracting a new generation of government leaders and talented staff is a fundamental goal of the AOC.<sup>3</sup> (See Attachment E.)

The TRN reports on their website that companies that implement telecommuting policies have seen a notable increase in productivity by their employees. Best Buy, British Telecom, Dow Chemical, and many others show that teleworkers are 35 to 40 percent more productive than non-telecommuters. More than two-thirds of employers have reported increased productivity among their teleworkers. Sun Microsystems' experience suggests that employees spend 60 percent of the commuting time they save performing work for the company. JD Edwards teleworkers are 20 to 25 percent more productive than their office counterparts. American Express workers produced 43 percent more than their office-based counterparts, and Compaq increased productivity by 15 to 45 percent.<sup>4</sup>

Because of technological advances in recent years, many employers, especially in the private sector, have found that enabling employees to telecommute has resulted in improvements in employee productivity, morale, and retention.

In addition to increased productivity, other benefits to both the employer and the employee have been associated with offering telework programs. These benefits include reduced absenteeism, retention of high-level employees who might otherwise choose to leave public employment due to work schedule inflexibility, and reduced commuter costs (see Lister & Harnish, infra, note 2).

Relevant telecommuting legislation

In recognition of the benefits of telecommute programs, legislation has been passed at the federal level and in the state of California encouraging telecommute programs for employees in positions where telecommuting is viable. The report 2012 Status of Telework in the Federal Government (see Attachment F) gives a detailed account of how the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 has transformed federal telework.<sup>5</sup>

In California, in 1990, Assembly Bill 2963 (Klehs; Stats. 1990, ch. 1389) added sections 14200 through 14203 to the Government Code, entitled “the State Employee Telecommuting Program,” authorizing state agencies to establish telecommuting programs as an element of transportation management programs. Four years later, Assembly Bill 2672 (Cortese; Stats. 1994, ch. 1209) amended section 14201 and added section 14200.1 to the Government Code “to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.” (Gov. Code, § 14200.1(b).) Section 14200.1 sets forth legislative findings, declarations, and intent:

- (a) The Legislature finds and declares the following:
  - (1) Telecommuting can be an important means to reduce air pollution and traffic congestion and to reduce the high costs of highway commuting.
  - (2) Telecommuting stimulates employee productivity while giving workers more flexibility and control over their lives.
- (b) It is the intent of the Legislature to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.

As amended, section 14201 deletes the earlier authorization and replaces it with a requirement that each state agency “shall review its work operations to determine where in its organization telecommuting can be of practical benefit to the agency [and] develop and implement a telecommuting plan as part of its telecommuting program in work areas where telecommuting is identified as being both practical and beneficial to the organization.”

Unintended negative consequences of telecommuting

According to the 2012 Status of Telework in the Federal Government report (see Attachment F, page 52), telecommuting can also have unintended negative consequences. Those cited in the report include the following:

- Potential for social and career isolation
- Reduced performance as a result of employee isolation
- Missed opportunities for meeting colleagues to allow for unplanned or serendipitous knowledge exchange
- Reduce overall sharing in workplaces

Implementation Requirements, Costs, and Operational Impacts

Option 1 implementation requirements. If option 1 is approved, the AOC will take the necessary steps to eliminate Policy 8.9 from the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual and will work with offices to inform current telecommuting staff and transition employees to perform their duties at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule. No other implementation requirements are needed.

Option 2 implementation requirements. If option 2 is approved, the AOC will take the necessary steps to amend Policy 8.9 to eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow AOC employees to telecommute on an ad hoc basis, based on special circumstances. HR will communicate the amended policy to all AOC staff and initiate steps to transition current regular telecommuting staff to perform their duties at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule. As previously indicated, HR has developed a process to track, monitor, and report on the use of ad hoc telecommuting within the AOC.

Option 3 implementation requirements. If option 3 is approved, the AOC will implement the proposed amended Policy 8.9 establishing strict controls and allowing for the approval, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding of telecommuting arrangements. HR will communicate the amended policy to all AOC staff and initiate steps to transition current regular telecommuting staff to be in compliance with the amended policy. HR has developed a process to track, monitor, and report on the use of regular and ad hoc telecommuting within the AOC. If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, a report on the status of telecommuting in the AOC will be provided in one year for review and further consideration.

PERSONNEL POLICIES AND PROCEDURES

Pilot Program 8.9

Pilot Program
Number: 8.9

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program

Contact: Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division, Human Resources Services Office

Program
Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work
  - (1) Applicability
  - (2) Request and Approval Process
  - (3) Remote Work Schedules
  - (4) Remote Work Log
- (C) Ad Hoc Remote Work
- (D) The Home Office
  - (1) Work Environment
  - (2) Office Equipment
  - (3) Information Security
  - (4) Health and Safety
- (E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities
- (F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this pilot program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this pilot program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This pilot program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this pilot program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this pilot program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work Pilot Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work

(1) Applicability

Only non-supervisory AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable pilot program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work
How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously.

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the pilot program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee's review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (excluding supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this pilot program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on a monthly report that will be submitted to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee's primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this pilot program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this pilot program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the Remote Work Application form (Attachment II) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC), Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) has prepared this six-month interim status report on the progress of Judicial Council Directive 26, which states that:

...the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC adheres to its telecommuting policy consistently and identifies and corrects all existing deviations and violations of the existing policy.

This report includes a six-month update of the pilot telecommuting program. It includes information on how the program was implemented, details on employee usage, how accountability has been monitored, and next steps in the process.

Previous Council Action

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council directed the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC consistently adhered to its existing telecommuting (working remotely) policy. The council also requested that the Administrative Director identify and correct all existing deviations from and violations of the existing policy.

On December 14, 2012, the council directed the Administrative Director to review Policy 8.9 (attachment 1), Working Remotely (Telecommuting), of the AOC Personnel and Policies Procedures Manual and provide the council with a report proposing any recommendations and amendments to the policy. The council also directed the Administrative Director to consider and report on alternatives—including whether this policy should remain in force—and return with a report and recommendations for the council’s February 2013 meeting.

During the February 2013 meeting, the Administrative Director requested, in his report, that the Judicial Council consider and approve one of the following options:

1. Eliminate all forms of telecommuting;
2. Eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or
3. Permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, including controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation.

The Judicial Council approved a twelve-month pilot of the proposed amended Policy 8.9 (attachment 2), Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program, authorizing employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee’s job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director. Included with the new pilot program, the council approved the use of ad hoc remote work arrangements, limited to no more than two workdays per month, when unknown business or personal needs arise.

The council directed that an interim report be provided to the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) following six months of implementation, and a full report be presented to the Judicial Council at the completion of the one-year pilot program.

Participant Data – Past and Present

The original policy allowed for up to eight days per month of telecommuting, and provided each office leader with discretion regarding any exceptions to the policy. In 2012, 98 employees (including supervisors and managers) participated in the Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Program, representing 454 remote working days per month. The telecommuting benefit for supervisors and managers was eliminated when the amended pilot program was implemented in March 2013.

Currently, under the pilot telecommute program, there are 69 individuals who have been approved to telecommute on a one-day-per-week basis, representing 276 remote workdays per month. This represents a 30 percent decrease in telecommute approvals and about a 40 percent decrease in the number of telecommute days utilized per month utilizing the criteria established by the Administrative Director.

Methodology and Process

Pilot Remote Work (Telecommute) Program Application Process

1. A transitional period was granted by the Administrative Director through May 31, 2013, to allow for an application period and to allow individuals on prior telecommute schedules time to adjust to the new policy parameters;
2. Employees were asked to submit applications to a central email account (pilot.telecommute@jud.ca.gov) for tracking and monitoring by HRSO;
3. The HRSO reviewed applications and submitted to the Administrative Director for final review and approval; and
4. If approved, employees began their one-day-per-week telecommute after June 3, 2013, on a date approved by their supervisors. Employees were also required to submit weekly logs describing work performed during their telecommute days.

All other aspects of the pilot program, such as ad hoc telecommuting, became effective on March 1, 2013.

Ad hoc Telecommute Program

The ad hoc telecommute program is a separate component of the pilot program, offering employees the ability to work remotely no more than two days per month when extenuating circumstances arise. The ad hoc telecommute program is only available to individuals who do not participate in the regular pilot telecommute program.

Special Circumstances Affecting Employees' Commutes

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the BART Strike

In early July 2013, a special circumstance occurred when the employees of the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) went on strike, which resulted in a shutdown of one of the main public transportation services utilized by staff to commute to and from the San Francisco office. During this period, the AOC Executive Office authorized individuals who were directly impacted by the strike to ad hoc telecommute on the first two days of the BART closure.

This exception also applied to individuals who participated in the regular pilot telecommute program; however, no individual employee was allowed to telecommute more than two days during this particular week. Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special BART telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the Bay Bridge Closure

In early September 2013, a special circumstance occurred when the Bay Bridge was closed due to the road changes related to the opening of the new eastern span of the bridge. The closure was expected to create heavy traffic and congested public transit. During this period, the AOC Executive Office provided individuals with options that would meet the work needs of the AOC while trying to alleviate the commute during the period of the bridge closure.

The options provided during the bridge closure included: 1) the ability to allow up to two ad hoc telecommute days for those individuals not participating in the pilot program; 2) the ability to shift the regular telecommute day to a day impacted by the bridge closure (for those participating in the pilot program); 3) the ability to work a flexible work schedule to avoid heavy commute periods; or 4) the ability to utilize available accruals to take time off during impacted days.

Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special Bridge Closure telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the Second BART Strike

In late October 2013, BART employees participated in a second strike, which, once again, resulted in a shutdown of one of the main public transportation services utilized by staff to commute to and from the San Francisco office. This closure of the public transportation system was anticipated and the AOC Executive Office authorized the following options to ease the commute burden on employees: 1) the use of the two ad hoc telecommute days, as allowed by policy to those individuals who were not participating in the pilot telecommute program; 2) allow those on the pilot telecommute program to shift their one telecommute day within that same week; 3) allow employees to adopt a flexible work schedule as permitted by business needs and supervisor approval; or 4) allow employees to use available accrued leave as permitted by business need and supervisor approval.

During the second BART strike, supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special BART telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Use of Work Logs

Individuals who participate in the pilot program are required to submit a weekly remote work log to the supervisor of the unit. This log includes a listing of the duties/tasks completed during the designated remote workday.

Sample Duties and Tasks Reported on Work Logs

Work logs have been collected from participants of the pilot program and those who worked remotely on an ad hoc basis during any of the special circumstances previously listed. The most common remote work duties or tasks reported included:

- Reviewing documents, researching (project based, legal research and data collection), analyzing data;
- Preparing for projects (presentations, timeline development, and curriculum development);
- Responding to communications (email and phone);
- Participating in conference calls; and
- Writing and editing reports.

Duties specific to a particular office were also listed, but were less common on the logs. The HRSO reviews the logs regularly and contacts individual supervisors with any questions or concerns regarding the content of the log or the duties/tasks performed. Supervisors and managers who had participants in either the pilot program or the ad hoc program were satisfied with both the quality and quantity of work provided during the remote work periods.

Policy and Cost Implications

It was determined that part-time employees, employees acting in a senior-level or lead capacity, and employees requiring direct supervision were not allowed to participate in pilot telecommute program, as the essential duties of their positions required their presence at the workplace.

Part-time Employees

For employees on a part-time schedule—as they are already unavailable one to three days per week—any additional time out of the workplace would further affect productivity.

Employees Acting in a Senior-level or Lead Capacity

Employees in a senior-level role—which involves regularly interacting with staff, sharing their knowledge and skills, and providing guidance—are critical to the daily operations of the AOC. Working remotely inhibits the ability of a person in this role to provide onsite guidance and face-to-face interaction.

Employees Requiring Direct Supervision

Most classifications identify the amount of supervision expected during the workday. If the phrase “works under direct supervision” is listed in an employee’s job classification, then that employee is expected to be present in the workplace to provide customer support under the guidance of the lead or supervisor. Additionally, if an employee’s regular presence in the workplace is integral to the functions of the unit, it is likely that the application will be denied by the Administrative Director.

Summary of Findings

- In the initial application period (March 1, 2013, through March 29, 2013) there were 105 applications received from employees, with a desire to telecommute one day per week.
- Upon review of those applications, the Administrative Director made certain policy determinations, as outlined in the Policy and Cost Implications section above, resulting in the approval of 63 of the applications for participation in the program and the denial of 42.
- As a result of feedback from the Management Council, the Administrative Director directed the HRSO to provide all offices with an updated application process—incorporating the policy determinations that would be utilized moving forward. Application packets were sent to all members of the Management Council on May 29, 2013.
- All new and resubmitted applications included a detailed job description listing the job duties that could be effectively performed remotely.

As a result of this amended process, one new application was submitted and five employees<sup>1</sup> resubmitted their applications to telecommute. Based on the application materials, recommendations from the supervisor, office leader and the HRSO, all six individuals were approved by the Administrative Director for one day per week telecommuting, in accordance with the pilot program parameters. These additional approvals resulted in a total of 106 applicants, 69 approvals and 37 denials.

Pilot Remote Work (Telecommute) Program Results

As of September 3, 2013, 69 individuals have been approved to telecommute through the pilot program, representing approximately 9.6 percent of current AOC staff. The chart below illustrates the number of participants from the various AOC offices:

Next Steps

The HRSO will continue to review the telecommute logs to monitor appropriate quantities of work and the types of duties/tasks performed.

The HRSO will continue to review and make recommendations to the Administrative Director for any new applications requesting to participate in the pilot program.

Regular reports will be provided to the Administrative Director on the number of employees participating in the program, both on the Remote Work (Telecommute) Program and the Ad Hoc Telecommute Program.

Future reports will include any special circumstances affecting employees' commutes.

Summary of Changes to Policy 8.9

The following chart summarizes revisions to Policy 8.9 and describes the controls and tracking mechanisms used in the more restrictive regular and ad hoc pilot programs.

	Regular Pilot Telecommute Program	Ad Hoc Telecommute Program
Defined eligibility requirements.	The AOC Executive Office restricted application of the program in comparison with the previous program and determined that part-time employees, employees acting in a senior-level or lead capacity, and employees requiring general supervision would not be allowed to participate in the pilot telecommute program as the essential duties of their positions required their presence at the workplace.	The AOC Human Resources Services Office reviewed requests to ensure that employees who were participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program were not, at the same time, working from home on an “ad hoc” basis.
Lower utilization rates.	With the implementation of the regular pilot policy, the AOC experienced a 33 percent decrease in telecommute participants from 2012 and an approximate 42 percent decrease in the number of telecommute days utilized per month.	The previous ad hoc program was not measured. In the current pilot program, the average ad hoc telecommute usage within the entire AOC has averaged approximately 36 days per month, representing less than one percent of staff work time spent ad hoc telecommuting. Well more than half of that usage occurred during three disruptive events in the Bay Area.
Centralized application and review process allowed for consistent application of the policy throughout the AOC.	In the previous policy, division directors were given the authority to approve or deny participation. Under the new pilot program, the decision is made by the Administrative Director.  The AOC received 105 applications for the regular pilot program. Upon review, the Administrative Director made certain policy determinations, resulting in only 65 employees currently participating in the program.	New to the pilot program, each office leader reviewed and approved each request for ad hoc telecommuting.

Attachment E:

Arming managers and supervisors with the tools necessary to address special circumstances.		During special circumstances in the past, division directors had the discretion to offer employees various options, which contributed to inconsistencies. When special circumstances occurred during the pilot period that required exceptional considerations, the Executive Office further defined consistent parameters agency wide of the ad hoc program to allow for flexibility while operating within the parameters of the policy.
Tracking and monitoring.	Participants submit work logs to their supervisors for review on a monthly basis. Work logs may be audited at any time to ensure that the duties performed while telecommuting are appropriate and sufficient for a full day's work.	The centralized review process allowed tracking of the utilization of the ad hoc remote work days. The AOC Human Resources Services Office examined patterns of usage and potential usage by employees who were not qualified to ad hoc telecommute.

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting) ~~Pilot~~ Program

Contact: Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division,
Human Resources Services Office

Program Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this ~~pilot~~ program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this ~~pilot~~ program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This ~~pilot~~ program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this ~~pilot~~ program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this ~~pilot~~ program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work ~~Pilot~~ Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(1) Applicability

Only ~~non-supervisory full-time~~ AOC employees (regular or temporary, ~~full-time or part-time~~, exempt or non-exempt) not serving in a supervisory or lead capacity or whose job description does not require general supervision may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable ~~pilot~~ program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work

How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Office leaders are expected to review each application with the expectation that services not be impacted as a result of telecommuting. As such, each office must strive to achieve a balance in ensuring that employees are readily available at all times.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously. HR will also consider the following when reviewing applications:

- Requested telecommute day
What is the requested telecommute day and are there coworkers telecommuting?
- Current division and unit balance
How many pilot program participants does the office currently have in relation to office and unit totals?
- Ability to handle scheduled and unexpected leaves
Will the office have coverage in times of scheduled days off or unexpected absences?
- Performance Improvement Plan (PIP)
Is the employee currently on a PIP? Has the employee had past performance issues?

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the ~~pilot~~ program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee’s review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees Full-time employees (excluding leads, supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including part-time employees, leads, managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, extenuating circumstances such as the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this ~~pilot~~ program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

~~“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. Intended to provide an ability to work remotely during special circumstance situations and are not meant to supplant the remote working program. “Ad Hoc” remote work situations are limited to a maximum of two days per month in any given month. Quarterly reports are provided to the Executive Office for review. Unusually high utilization or patterns of usage by an office or an individual may result in suspension of the “Ad Hoc” opportunity at the discretion of the Administrative Director.~~

Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working-request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership ~~may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on~~ shall submit a monthly usage report ~~that will be submitted~~ to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee’s primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. \(Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)\). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following:

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this ~~pilot~~ program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this ~~pilot~~ program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the ~~Remote Work Application form (Attachment H)~~ Remote Work Application form \(Attachment I\) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements, including renewals, must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee prior to commencement of the remote work schedule. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

AOC Utilization of the At-Will Employment Policy

The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) adopted a new AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual in July 2011. Chapter 2, General Employment Policies begins with Policy 2.1, Employment At Will. This policy clearly states that the AOC is an at-will employer. This means that both the employees and the AOC have the right to terminate employment at any time, with or without cause. Although this policy provides the AOC with the ability to terminate employment with or without cause, the reason for termination must be a lawful reason. Employees who are terminated from the AOC retain the right to file complaints with the Department of Fair Employment and Housing (DFEH) or the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) and potentially litigate damages against the AOC.

Recent Use of the At-Will Employment Policy

In February 2012 the AOC Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) investigated a number of serious employee-related issues. At the time the Interim Administrative Director of the Courts and the Interim Chief Deputy Director instructed the HRSO team to work collaboratively with the Legal Services Office (LSO) to address any serious performance issues or violations of policy. During this time HRSO staff drafted a number of Performance Improvement Plans (PIP) to provide opportunities for improvement and appropriate guidance to employees who had fallen below the expected performance levels.

Throughout this period the AOC continued to exercise the at-will policy when appropriate, and terminated individuals who did not demonstrate improved performance or seriously violated policies, procedures or ethical standards.

Since February 2012, the AOC has exercised the at-will policy and has terminated a number of individuals from employment for performance-related issues or for serious violations of policy or procedure. Although the AOC is an at-will employer, it has, at its discretion, provided the terminated employee with a written reason or rationale for the determination. The AOC generally provides written justification to the Employment Development Department (EDD) when considering claims for unemployment.

Reductions in Staffing Policy and AOC Layoffs

On May 18, 2012, the Interim Administrative Director approved Policy 2.9, Reductions in Staffing (Layoffs). This policy provides guidance, based on non-discriminatory, business-related criteria, to implement staffing reductions and achieve necessary cost savings. The at-will employment policy provided leadership the flexibility to develop the policy which met the needs of the AOC.

In June 2012 the AOC implemented its first round of layoffs. At the completion of the layoff process 40 individuals were separated from employment with the AOC.

Next Steps

While the existence of the at-will employment policy provides flexibility when making employment decisions, it is the goal of the AOC to encourage quality communications in a rich and supportive working environment. In order to achieve this goal the Administrative Director has directed the Human Resources Services Office to fully implement Policy 3.9, Performance Management Program, of the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual.

In order to properly institute a quality and meaningful program a number of steps need to occur to create a foundation for true performance management. The AOC will outline these steps in a report to the Judicial Council in June 2013, with a plan for full implementation beginning January 2014. The AOC will implement a uniform performance management program throughout the AOC.

Additionally, the AOC will review Policy 8.1, Standards of Conduct, and amend it to clearly express the conduct expectations of AOC employees and the disciplinary process for issues related to performance or misconduct. Specifically, the AOC will add an official Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) process to the disciplinary process, which will highlight to employees that communication is the most effective method of initiating growth and change. To strengthen the process, the AOC, through the classification and compensation study, will be updating job descriptions for all employees, which will ensure the program accurately accounts for employee performance and makes it easier for managers and supervisors to identify areas for improvement.

Furthermore, the supervisor/manager training program, initiated in January 2013, will provide direct guidance to managers and supervisors on identifying performance gaps and effective methods of performance management as well as outlining the challenges of managing employees in an at-will environment.

The first set of courses focus on “The At-Will Environment and Other Legal Issues.” The AOC will conduct eight sessions on this topic between May 1, 2013 and June 20, 2013. The training continues throughout the year, with culminating sessions, which highlight performance management, in November and December 2013. After the training, the utilization of a uniform performance management program, combined with clear discipline procedures, the at-will policy and accurate job descriptions, will provide the AOC with a flexible and responsible approach to address and resolve any performance or conduct concerns.

Policy Number: 2.1

Title: Employment At Will

Contact: Human Resources Division, Policy Development Unit

Policy Statement: The AOC is an at-will employer.

All employment at the AOC is "at will." This means that both employees and the AOC have the right to terminate employment at any time, with or without advance notice, and with or without cause. No one other than the Administrative Director of the Courts has the authority to alter this arrangement, to enter into an agreement for employment for a specified period of time, or to make any agreement contrary to this at-will policy. Any such agreement must be in writing, signed by the Administrative Director of the Courts, in order to be effective.

Council Directive 26

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC adheres to its telecommuting policy consistently and identifies and corrects all existing deviations and violations of the existing policy. The Administrative Director of the Courts must review the AOC telecommuting policy and provide the council with a report proposing any recommendations on amendments to the policy, by the December 13-14, 2012, council meeting.

SEC Recommendation 7-40

The AOC must adhere to its telecommuting policy (Section 8.9 of the AOC personnel manual). It must apply the policy consistently and must identify and correct all existing deviations and violations of the existing policy.

<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: At the April 24, 2014 Judicial Council meeting the council approved the telecommute pilot program as a regular telecommute program, retaining additional controls for approving, monitoring, and rescinding participation.

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council directed the Administrative Director to ensure that the council was consistently adhering to its existing policy on telecommuting (working remotely) (Policy 8.9, AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures; and to identify and correct any deviation from or violation of the existing policy.

On December 14, 2012, the council further directed the Administrative Director to review the original policy and make recommendations on any proposed amendments. The council subsequently asked the Administrative Director to consider alternatives to telecommuting, including whether telecommuting should be eliminated, and to return with a report and recommendations for council consideration at its February 2013 meeting.

In the February 2013 report, the Judicial Council permitted telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, including controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation.

At the April 24, 2014 council meeting the council approved the pilot program as a regular telecommute program, retaining the following current additional controls for approving, monitoring, and rescinding participation put in place by the AOC's Executive Office:

- Employees who serve in a lead capacity may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis (managers and supervisors were already precluded from participating);
- Employees working part time may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis;

- Employees requiring general supervision may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis;
- The Administrative Director has the discretion to suspend the use of regular and ad hoc remote work assignments at any time;
- Renewals must be made annually and approved by the Administrative Director before the commencement of the remote work schedule; and
- At the conclusion of the classification and compensation study, the Human Resources Services Office will conduct an additional review of participation to ensure consistency with any recommendations made as a result of the study.

The council also directed the Administrative Director of the Courts to provide the Judicial Council with an annual performance evaluation of the regular telecommute program.

The Telecommute Program will continue to be evaluated and the council will receive updates on the program as part of the Annual Report to the council.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

Since the telecommute pilot was approved and policy modified, there are fewer people telecommuting. HR reports that 69 people telecommuted the first year; this year 76 people telecommute which is a drop of 30 from the original count of 98 telecommuters prior to the updated policy.

The annual report to council will be provided at the April 2015 Council meeting.

Executive Summary

Recognizing the benefits of telecommute programs, legislation at the federal level and in the state of California encourages telecommute programs for government employees in positions where telecommuting is viable.<sup>1</sup>

The Administrative Director of the Courts recommends that the Judicial Council consider and select one of four options concerning telecommuting for employees of the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC).

Recommendation

The options presented for consideration by the Judicial Council are as follows:

1. Approve the pilot program as a regular telecommute program, with the current additional controls for approving, monitoring, and rescinding participation;

2. Extend the current pilot telecommute program an additional year;
3. Eliminate regular telecommuting and allow only limited, ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or
4. Eliminate all forms of telecommuting.

The Administrative Director of the Courts recommends that the Judicial Council approve Option 1: to remove the pilot restriction from the program and retain the additional controls put in place by the Executive Office. These additional controls are as follows:

- Employees who serve in a lead capacity may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis (managers and supervisors were already precluded from participating);
- Employees working part time may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis;
- Employees requiring general supervision may not participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis;
- The Administrative Director has the discretion to suspend the use of regular and ad hoc remote work assignments at any time;
- Renewals must be made annually and approved by the Administrative Director before the commencement of the remote work schedule; and
- At the conclusion of the classification and compensation study, the Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) will conduct an additional review of participation to ensure consistency with any recommendations made as a result of the study.

Previous Council Action

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council directed the Administrative Director to ensure that the AOC was consistently adhering to its existing policy on telecommuting (working remotely) (Policy 8.9, AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures; Attachment A), and to identify and correct any deviation from or violation of the existing policy.

On December 14, 2012, the council further directed the Administrative Director to review the original policy and make recommendations on any proposed amendments.

The council subsequently asked the Administrative Director to consider alternatives to telecommuting, including whether telecommuting should be eliminated, and to return with a report and recommendations for council consideration at its February 2013 meeting.

In the February 2013 report (Attachment B), the Judicial Council was presented with and considered the following options:

1. To eliminate all forms of telecommuting;
2. To eliminate regular telecommuting and allow only limited, ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or

3. To permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, including controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation.

The council approved Option 3 as a 12-month pilot program. The program was implemented, allowing employees authorized by the Administrative Director to work remotely when consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions. As a part of the pilot program, the council also approved the use of ad hoc remote work arrangements, limited to no more than two workdays per month, in the event of unforeseen business or personal needs (Pilot Telecommute Program Policy; Attachment C).

The council requested that an interim report on program implementation be prepared for the Executive and Planning Committee after six months (Attachment D), and a full report after one year, to enable the council to identify a course of action.

Rationale for Recommendation

Following council approval of the pilot program, the Executive Office added the additional controls to ensure consistent and equitable application of the policy. With these controls in place, and based on the monitoring process implemented, the AOC has demonstrated that a remote work program can be effectively and efficiently implemented in a manner that supports employees in the performance of their duties without any negative impacts on customers or colleagues. A summary of the changes to the policy is provided in Attachment E.

The regular program

Defined eligibility requirements for regularly scheduled remote work. The original telecommute policy allowed for up to eight days of telecommuting per month, and provided each office leader with discretion to make exceptions to the policy. In 2012, 98 employees (including supervisors and managers) participated in the program, representing a total of 454 remote work days per month.

Under the pilot program initiated in 2013, a structural control limiting telecommuting to one day per week was established to address any question of a diminution in service to customers. The Executive Office determined that in addition to management staff, part-time employees, employees acting in a senior or lead capacity, and employees requiring general supervision would not be permitted to participate because the primary essential duties of their positions required their on-site presence at the workplace.

Exactly 109 applications were received. Using the revised criteria for participation, 69 employees were approved to telecommute regularly one day per week. The current number of employees participating in the program has dropped from the original 69 to 65, for a total of 260 remote workdays per month. This figure represents a 33 percent reduction in the number of participants from 2012, and a 42 percent reduction in the total number of telecommute days per month.

Approximately 40 percent of applications were denied. Unsuccessful applicants were informed of the reasons for denial. Additional information concerning eligibility was communicated to all employees.

Table 1 reflects changes in the number of telecommuting employees since 2012.

Table 1. Change in Number of Telecommuting Employees

Total	98	454	65	260

Note: Offices without employees participating in regularly scheduled telecommuting are not included.

Use of work logs. The original telecommute policy did not require work logs. The pilot program does. The work log lists the duties performed and work produced while an employee works remotely. Under the pilot program, work logs are submitted to the employee’s supervisor for review and approval, and subsequently to the Human Resources Services Office (HRSO). Work logs are audited by the HRSO to ensure that the duties performed while telecommuting are appropriate and sufficient for a full day’s work and consistent with the pilot program.

The most common remote tasks reported include:

- Reviewing documents and researching and analyzing data (project-based work, legal research, and data collection);
- Preparing projects (presentations, timeline development, and curriculum development);
- Responding to communications (e-mail and phone);
- Participating in conference calls;
- Writing and editing reports; and
- Performing duties specific to particular offices and positions.

HRSO contacts individual supervisors with questions or concerns regarding the content of the work log or the duties/tasks performed. Commonly asked questions are as follows:

1. Is the nature of work consistent with the business needs of the AOC?
2. Is the employee effectively managing time?
3. Is the employee's work satisfactory and timely?
4. Has there been a reduction in quantity of work produced?

Supervisors and managers with participants in the pilot program reported satisfaction with both the quality and the quantity of work carried out during the remote work periods. Work logs have been effective in supporting program monitoring and adherence to high service standards.

The ad hoc program

Tracking and reporting. The ad hoc telecommute program is a separate component of the pilot program, offering employees the ability to work remotely no more than two days per month when extenuating circumstances arise. It is available only to employees who do not participate in the regular pilot telecommute program.

Before the pilot program, instances of ad hoc telecommuting were not accounted for, and the AOC lacked a methodology to assess and determine usage. There were no restrictions on the number of ad hoc days an employee could be approved to take, effectively creating a situation that could be employed to distort the original regular telecommuting rule. According to the SEC report, this freedom led to instances in which some employees worked in their AOC offices only infrequently. Regular telecommute program participants could also seek additional telecommute days through the ad hoc process. Since the pilot program was established, HRSO receives monthly ad hoc telecommuting data from each office and reviews it for trends or areas of concern. Table 2 below details the use of ad hoc telecommuting, by office, between March 2013 and January 2014.

Note: Offices that did not have employees telecommuting on an ad hoc basis are not included.

The average ad hoc telecommuting usage among the entire AOC for this period was 36 days per month, representing less than one percent of staff work time. (This figure does not account for ad hoc days resulting from the special events outlined below.)

Expanded management toolkit in addressing three disruptive events. The level of flexibility afforded by the ad hoc telecommute program provided a valuable management tool during three major commute-related special circumstances that affected the Bay Area: two transit strikes and a bridge closure.

BART strikes. In July 2013, and again in October 2013, Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) employees went on strike, shutting down one of the main public transportation services for staff commuting to and from the San Francisco office. The Executive Office authorized employees directly affected by the strike to telecommute on an ad hoc basis the first two days of the BART closure. The exception also applied to employees participating in the regular pilot telecommute program to shift one of their telecommute days to the week of the strike; however, no employee was allowed to telecommute more than two days during that week. Employees were also allowed to use a flexible work schedule (earlier start and end times) or accrued leave as permitted by business need and with supervisor approval.

Bay Bridge closure. In September 2013, the Bay Bridge was closed pending the opening of its new eastern span. The closure was expected to create heavy traffic and congested public transit. During this period, the Executive Office provided employees with options that would meet the work needs of the agency while trying to alleviate commuting challenges. These options included:

- Allowing up to two ad hoc telecommute days for those employees not participating in the regular pilot program;
- Shifting a regular telecommute day to a day when the bridge was closed;
- Having a flexible work schedule to avoid heavy commute periods; and
- Using available leave accruals to take time off during impacted days.

Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that employees who worked remotely during these days had sufficient assignments for the full period. Employees who participated in any of the special-circumstance days were required to submit to their supervisors a remote work log, which was, in turn, submitted to HRSO.

Prior to implementation of the new pilot program, in instances where such special circumstances occurred, office heads had the discretion to offer commute options for their respective offices. Since the implementation of the pilot program, the Executive Office instead establishes consistent, agencywide commute alternatives that include both telecommuting and non-telecommuting options.

Ad hoc remote usage rates during the BART strikes and the Bay Bridge closure are illustrated in table 3.

Table 3. Ad Hoc Telecommuting During Transit Troubles

Comments, Alternatives Considered, and Policy Implications

With the implementation of and strict adherence to guidelines during the pilot year, and with continued oversight and monitoring by the HRSO under the direction of the Administrative Director, four options are presented for consideration by the council.

Option 1: Adopt as an ongoing program the pilot telecommute policy, including the additional controls put in place during the implementation of the pilot program.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, the “pilot” terminology would be removed from the policy. Participation would still be based on the fiscal year cycle, and employees would reapply annually to ensure that job duties are still appropriate to telecommuting.

The telecommute program would continue to be implemented through a centralized process managed by the HRSO. This process involves a review of each new application by office leadership using the following parameters:

1. Nature of Work. What is the type of work being performed by the employee, and is the telecommuting arrangement conducive to the duties necessary to perform the work?
2. Quantity of Work. Can a sufficient number of work activities be performed at home?
3. Quality of Work. Has the employee demonstrated an ability to carry out high-quality work with minimal supervision?

4. Timeliness. Has the employee consistently shown that he or she is able to work within established deadlines?
5. Ability to handle multiple priorities. Has the applicant demonstrated a strong ability to manage multiple, competing priorities?

Once office leadership completes its initial review, a recommendation is made to the HRSO. HR then conducts a second review of each application against these same parameters, as well as the following additional criteria:

1. Current division and unit balance. What is the requested telecommute day, and do other employees in the office also telecommute on that day? If so, what is the potential impact to scheduling and workload?
2. Ability to handle scheduled and unexpected leaves. Will the office have coverage in times of scheduled days off or unexpected absences?
3. Performance Improvement Plan (PIP). Is the employee currently on a PIP? Has the employee had past performance issues?

The HRSO then forwards its review and recommendation to the Administrative Director for a final decision on participation

See Proposed Policy 8.9, Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Program; Attachment F.

Option 2: Extend the current pilot program for an additional year.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, the pilot program would be extended for one year, with further review by the Judicial Council in April 2015. All current controls would remain in place, and all interested employees would need to resubmit applications before current participant agreements end on June 30, 2014.

Option 3: Eliminate regular telecommuting and allow only limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, regular telecommuting would no longer be permitted at the AOC. However, to allow for management flexibility in special circumstances, the Administrative Director would have discretion to allow employees to telecommute on an ad hoc basis with the approval of their supervisors or managers and office leadership.

Option 4: Eliminate all forms of telecommuting.

Should the Judicial Council approve this option, telecommuting on a regular and an ad hoc basis would no longer be permitted at the AOC. Such a decision could present employee retention issues, in that the agency would be unable to offer comparable employee benefits in a competitive labor market. Further, elimination of the program could also affect employee morale and performance.

Should the council approve Option 1 or 2, amended job descriptions resulting from the classification and compensation study will be reviewed against the telecommuting criteria and could potentially change employee eligibility during 2014–2015.

Implementation Requirements, Costs, and Operational Impacts

Implementation of the pilot telecommute program is centralized under the oversight of HRSO; ultimate authority to approve or deny participation in the program rests with the Administrative Director of the Courts.

All regular pilot telecommuting schedules will conclude during the week of June 30, 2014. Should the program continue, employees wishing to participate in the program would be required to (re)submit applications. HRSO staff would review and submit the applications to the Administrative Director for final review and approval or denial. Approved employees would commence their one-day-per-week telecommute on a date approved by their supervisors.

Participating employees would be required to submit weekly logs describing work performed on telecommute days. A human resources analyst would expend approximately 24 hours per month tracking and documenting program usage, in addition to conducting initial reviews of any new applications.

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting)

Contact: Human Resources Division, Policy Development Unit

Policy

Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program provides employees the opportunity to work from home when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the employee's division director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Applicability
- (C) Request and Approval Process
- (D) Remote Work Schedules
- (E) The Home Office
  - (1) Work Environment
  - (2) Office Equipment
  - (3) Information Security
  - (4) Health and Safety
- (F) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities
- (G) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

The AOC recognizes the potential management and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. This policy does not intend to cover employees working remotely due to work-related travel.

(B) Applicability

Only AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program.

(C) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the division director to approve or decline the request. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the division director. In making this determination, the division director will consider work-related criteria, including:

- The employee's job functions and feasibility of performing work away from the office;
- Degree of supervision required;
- The performance and work habits of the employee;
- Business needs, including work demands of the employee's unit; and
- Suitability of proposed home work environment.

A request to participate in the remote work program may be approved only when the division director determines that, while working remotely, the employee can perform all the duties and responsibilities of the position in a productive, efficient, and satisfactory manner that is consistent with the needs of the organization. Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Requests to work remotely as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor or the Human Resources Division, Integrated Disability Management Unit.

The Remote Worker's Agreement and Remote Work Checklist must be signed as indicated before remote working begins.

(D) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (including supervisors and managers) may be approved to work remotely as follows:

- During the first three months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After three months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work remotely up to a maximum of four days per month.
- After six successful months of participation in the remote work program, employees are eligible to request to work remotely up to a maximum of eight days per month.

Any exceptions to the above scheduling guidelines are at the discretion of the division director, in advance consultation with the Director of Human Resources. The remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(A\)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- Remote workers may request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working remotely.

- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day.

An employee may also be approved to work remotely on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs.

(E) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee’s primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working remotely. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Services Division does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working remotely.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Services Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working remotely. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(D\)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Services HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work remotely or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working remotely, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Division, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(F) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6, and AOC Computer Use Best Practices. In addition to AOC requirements on time reporting (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(D\)), remote workers may be required to submit work logs of time spent and work performed while working remotely, at the discretion of their supervisor.

(G) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this policy may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment.

The Remote Work Application should be discussed and renewed annually, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it is not in the best interests of the AOC or the employee.

Participation in the remote work program is approved based on specific criteria considered by the division director on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

The Administrative Director of the Courts requests that the Judicial Council consider and approve one of the following options concerning telecommuting. In addition, the Administrative Director confirms that all 85 telecommuting staff are currently in compliance with the existing policy and has prepared a report containing options for consideration by the Judicial Council. The report contains options to: (1) eliminate all forms of telecommuting; (2) eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or (3) permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, which contains controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation. If the revised telecommute policy is approved, a follow-up report will be provided to the Judicial Council in one year.

Previous Council Action

In August 2012, the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) recommended that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require compliance with the requirements and policies of the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual, including compliance with the rules limiting telecommuting, specifically concerning Policy 8.9 Working

Remotely (Telecommuting). As a response to that directive, the Administrative Director confirmed that all 85 telecommuting staff are in compliance with the existing policy and, in consultation with the AOC Executive Office and office directors, proposed amendments to the policy to address implementation and compliance concerns stated in a report presented by E&P to the council at its August 31, 2012, meeting.

At its December 2012 meeting, E&P further proposed an amendment to Judicial Council directive 26 to enlarge its scope to include the question of whether a telecommute program should remain in force. The proposed revisions to Policy 8.9 and options outlined in this report respond to the amended directive for discussion at the council’s February 2013 meeting.

Current Status

There are 85 regular employees in compliance with the current Policy 8.9 who have been approved for telecommuting within the AOC. The chart below lists the eight AOC offices that currently participate in the program.

Participating Offices	Count of Participating Employees	% of Total AOC Population
Center for Families, Children & the Courts	27	3.76%
Center for Judiciary Education and Research	11	1.53%
Court Operations Special Services Office	9	1.25%
Criminal Justice Court Services Office	3	.42%
Information Technology Services Office	19	2.65%
Judicial Council Support Services	1	.14%
Legal Services Office	11	1.53%
Trial Court Liaison Office	4	.56%
Grand Total	85	11.84%

The following ten offices do not currently participate in the regular telecommuting program.

Non - Participating Offices
Judicial Branch Capital Program Office	Office of Communications	Special Projects Office
Fiscal Services Office	Office of Governmental Affairs	Trial Court Administrative Services Office
Human Resources Services Office	Office of Security
Office of Administrative Services	Office of Real Estate & Facilities Management

Of the 718 regular employees only 85 regular employees have been approved to participate in the program, representing 11.84 percent of the AOC regular workforce. The remaining 633 regular employees work the standard workweek in an assigned AOC work location.

Duties approved for telecommuting

Office leadership have considered and approved regular telecommute schedules depending upon various job responsibilities, including performing legal research, drafting legal opinions, analyzing data, writing reports, and providing network support/administration. Examples of such duties/responsibilities include:

- Legal research to update legal publications, course curricula, and online courses
- Research, data analysis, and report writing connected with advisory committee or other group work
- Configuring, administering, and supporting network and server infrastructure
- Creating lesson plans, developing PowerPoint presentations, and meeting via phone with planning committees
- Writing content for online courses, writing scripts for broadcasts (for both judges and court staff), and drafting reports
- Writing, editing, and generating technical documents
- Preparing and reviewing grant applications, including the preparation of budget sheets and forecasts

Duties not approved for telecommuting

Not all employees have been deemed suitable to participate in the telecommute program due to the nature of the work assigned. Employees who have been deemed ineligible for a regular telecommute schedule include those whose job responsibilities require them to be present in the AOC offices. Examples of such duties/responsibilities include:

- Processing of daily Court-Appointed Counsel compensation claims (which requires specialized software and face-to-face interaction with Accounting staff)
- Handling daily intake of retired judge assignment requests (which requires access to specialized software and constant telephone access)
- Processing of payroll or benefit information (which requires restricted access to the State Controller's Office system) and employee relations interactions (which are best handled in a face-to-face meeting)
- Setting up new computers, delivering them to employees, repairing malfunctioning computers, and processing end-of-life equipment for reutilization/disposal
- Coordinating logistics for judicial education programs (which requires being available to a number of CJER staff)
- Managing the logistics of securing meeting rooms, lodging, and other requirements for education programs and meetings
- Hands-on consulting with other employees in specific subject matter areas, such as instructional design or WebEx support

Additional reasons why employees have not been allowed to telecommute include:

- Employees on a performance improvement plan who require supervision, assessment, and development on site
- Managers and supervisors who need to be available to their staff on as-needed basis

Options for Consideration and Policy Implications

Option 1: Eliminate all forms of telecommuting

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be eliminated and telecommuting, both on a regular schedule and on an ad hoc basis, would no longer be permitted in the AOC.

Benefits of adopting option 1

Improved perception/reputation. By eliminating all forms of telecommuting, AOC staff will be available at all times to assist their customers within the Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal, and the trial courts. The AOC has been under public scrutiny to reform and restructure its current practices/policies. Elimination of the telecommuting program enables the AOC to strengthen its reputation with the trial courts and the public.

Ability to supervise employees on site; employee availability. Under a telecommuting program not strictly managed and controlled by a centralized oversight group, there may be a perception of little to no supervision of employees on telecommuting arrangements. By eliminating this option, it eliminates this perception and thereby ensures that all employees on site are properly supervised by their supervisor or manager. Elimination of the telecommuting program will have AOC employees at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule, with the exception of the one day per month mandatory furlough.

Consistency with most written trial court policies. Most trial courts have not adopted a formal telecommute policy for their employees. Elimination of the policy places the AOC on equal terms with the trial courts and reduces the perception of unavailability.

All offices treated the same regardless of the nature of work. The wide latitude of telecommuting arrangements within the AOC, as allowed under the current Policy 8.9, has resulted in different applications of the policy across all offices. By eliminating the ability to telecommute, employees will be treated the same regardless of their duties and responsibilities.

Challenges of adopting option 1

Reduced motivation potentially leading to reduced performance. The ability to telecommute is a very important job benefit to those who participate in the program. Complete elimination of the program could result in less-motivated employees, which could have a direct effect on job performance and productivity.

Retention issues—potential for losing quality workforce. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for remote working. If the work from home program is eliminated, it could result in a loss of quality employees to competing employers. It could also influence future ability to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Employees will perceive this as another take-away. Over the past four years employees have endured several changes in the workplace that have been perceived by the employees as “take-aways.” While many changes have been a direct result of the economic downturn, others, such as this program, are “no-cost” benefits. Removing such a benefit would most likely be perceived by employees as yet another take-away, with a corresponding direct impact on employee morale.

Potential increased commute cost to employees. Employees who currently work remotely are relieved of the time and cost of commuting for the day(s) they work from home. For example, a commuter from the East Bay could save 45 minutes each way to and from work, as well as $6 to $10 per day in transportation costs. An individual participating in a one day per week remote work assignment would have an increased cost of $24 to $40 per month and will spend approximately 6 additional hours per month commuting.

Ability of the AOC to offer comparable employee benefits in the competitive San Francisco labor market. AOC HR contacted employers within the San Francisco Bay Area to determine what, if any, telecommuting programs they offer to their employees. Of the public entities contacted, the City and County of San Francisco, Superior Court of San Francisco County, San Francisco State University, and University of California, San Francisco offer some form of telecommuting. Of the private entities contacted, Adobe, Charles Schwab, Gap, Inc., and Yahoo! also offer some form of telecommuting. Based on information gathered, it appears that remote working has become a standard practice among major San Francisco employers and is a highly desired benefit of job seekers. To continue to be competitive in the San Francisco labor market, it is critical to develop and maintain programs that meet the business needs of the organization to attract and retain quality staff.

Option 2: Eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be revised to only allow for limited, ad hoc telecommuting not to exceed two days in any given month. In this option telecommuting would only be allowed under special circumstances that would meet the business needs of the AOC. For example, an individual who is on vacation at home and unable to come to the office is required to complete an unexpected project by close of business. That individual could be approved to work from home on that day so the project can be completed and the individual credited with the work time utilized.

Oversight of this option would be granted to office leadership, with monthly ad hoc telecommute reports submitted to the Human Resources Services Office for tracking and review. A quarterly utilization report would be provided to the Administrative Director.

Benefits of adopting option 2

Improved perception/reputation. Elimination of regular telecommuting and the restriction of the program to only include remote work on an ad hoc basis may reduce the negative perception of the AOC telecommuting program. This restriction of the telecommuting program enables the AOC to strengthen its reputation with the trial courts and the public.

Allows for flexibility in meeting critical business needs. While this option does not provide for a regularly scheduled work from home day, it does provide the AOC with the ability to approve limited, one-time, as-needed remote work that would meet a specific, critical business need.

Consistent with some trial court practices. While many trial courts do not have a formal written remote work policy, some trial courts do allow an ad hoc type of work from home program. Some trial courts have allowed staff to work from home to complete a report, a project, and research or data analysis in a quieter, less interrupted setting.

Challenges of adopting option 2

Negative perception/reputation. The AOC has been under public scrutiny to reform and restructure its current practices/policies. Allowing for even ad hoc telecommuting does not completely address the perception that the AOC is unavailable to address trial courts' needs in a timely fashion.

Reduced motivation leading to reduced performance (for individuals who have lost a regular telecommute schedule). The ability to telecommute is a very important job benefit to those who participate in the program. Elimination of the regular remote work program and replacing it with a much more restrictive ad hoc program could result in less-motivated employees and could have a direct effect on job performance and productivity.

Retention issues—potential for losing quality workforce. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for regular remote working. If the work from home program is reduced to an ad hoc program, it could result in a loss of quality employees to competing employers. It could also influence future ability to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Employees will perceive this as another take-away. Over the past four years employees have endured several changes in the workplace that have been perceived by the employees as “take-aways.” While many changes have been a direct result of the economic downturn, others, such as this program, are “no-cost” benefits. The severe restricting of such a benefit would likely be perceived by employees as yet another take-away potentially having a direct impact on employee morale.

Potential increased commute cost to employee. Employees who currently work remotely are relieved of the time and cost of commuting for the day(s) they work from home. For example, a commuter from the East Bay could save 45 minutes each way to and from work, as well as $6 to $10 per day in transportation costs. An individual participating in a one day per week remote work assignment would have an increased cost of $24 to $40 per month and will spend approximately 6 additional hours per month commuting.

Option 3: Permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, which contains controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation in the telecommute program

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be revised to the more restrictive policy outlined below.

The proposed Policy 8.9 contains a number of revisions that, if incorporated, address many of the concerns raised. For example, it narrows the scope of the telework policy to nonsupervisory positions, limits the number of days a person can utilize ad hoc or regular telecommuting, and prohibits a combination of ad hoc and regular telecommuting.

Further, to address accountability issues, it includes tracking procedures. AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work remotely. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Additionally, HR would provide a review of the application process and provide recommendations to the Administrative Director or designee for final consideration/approval. This process is designed to ensure that all participants meet and adhere to policy guidelines.

Comparison between current and proposed

The goal is to design a program that is in the best public interest and that benefits the employees, while addressing the challenges identified, i.e., how to measure productivity for the employees who work from home, how to determine what positions are suitable for telecommuting, and how to fairly implement the policy.

The chart below illustrates the differences between the current policy and the proposed policy:

Criteria	Current Policy	Proposed Policy
Employment eligibility	After 6 months of employment	After 12 months of employment
Limits definition of “Home” location	None	Restricts “Home” location to one in the state of California

Limits number of regularly scheduled telecommute days	Up to 8 days per month	No more than 1 day per week in any given week
Limits participation in regular remote work program	None	Limited to only nonsupervisory AOC employees
Limits participation in ad hoc telecommute days	None	Limited to 2 days per month in any given month; available to all AOC employees; not available to employees on a regular telecommute schedule
Consideration/review process	Office leadership discretion	1. Office leadership review, 2. Human Resources review, 3. Administrative Director/designee approval
Factors for approval consideration	Office leadership discretion	Defined consideration factors: 1. Nature of work, 2. Quantity of work, 3. Quality of work, 4. Timeliness, 5. Ability to handle multiple priorities
Approval authority	Office leadership approval	Administrative Director/designee approval
Allowable exceptions	Office leadership discretion	None (except for reasonable accommodations for a disability consistent with law)
Work logs maintained	None	Required for each regularly scheduled remote work day
Tracking of ad hoc telecommute days	None	Tracking required for each day of ad hoc remote work by office leadership and Human Resources
Frequency of productivity monitoring	Annually	Continuing duty of office leadership

The amended policy recognizes the potential benefits of an organized, managed remote work program, and the revisions reflect an emphasis on accessibility, transparency, and consistency. The final amended policy includes two key components that address these themes: availability of staff to address inquiries from internal customers, the courts, and the public; and the assignment of a centralized unit to oversee and manage the telework program.

Benefits of adopting option 3

Increased productivity. Overall productivity may be improved because the more desirable and attractive working conditions result in higher levels of employee motivation. A number of companies that have implemented telecommuting in the workplace have seen increased productivity in their employees.<sup>1</sup>

Work/life balance and employee motivation. Employees perceive the remote working opportunity as a workplace benefit. Employees appreciate and will recognize the efforts by the AOC to maintain attractive work benefits in a challenging economic time.

Work environment. The nature of work appropriate for remote working situations is best served in quiet, uninterrupted settings where quality thinking can occur. The lack of interruptions can not only expedite the completion of a project, but can also increase the quality of the finished product.

Increased monitoring. The utilization of work logs demonstrates the quality and quantity of work performed, which can potentially lead to an increase in productivity.

Employee retention and recruitment. Several employees have expressed that this “benefit” is an important aspect of their decision to be employed at the AOC. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for remote working. This option could allow the AOC to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Emulates state policies and legislation that encourage utilization of telecommute programs. Government Code section 14200.1(b): “It is the intent of the Legislature to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.” The standard template for telecommute policy utilized by the state agencies is provided on the Department of General Services website at: <http://www.dgs.ca.gov/dgs/ProgramsServices/telework.aspx>

Challenges of adopting option 3

Perception of monitoring, supervising, and evaluating off-site employees. Under any telecommuting program, there may be a perception of little to no supervision of employees on telecommuting arrangements. Telecommuting may make it more challenging to review the work product on a regular basis to ensure productivity standards are being met.

Limits face-to-face interaction/exchange of information. Working from home could reduce the interpersonal, collaborative relationships necessary for the development of a sound work product.

Impacts on non-telecommuting employees. If regular telecommuting is continued, the AOC will continue to have employees whose job responsibilities prohibit them from participation. For these employees there may be a perception of disparity.

Information on current telecommute practices, public and private

The Telework Research Network (TRN) is an independent consulting and research organization that publishes findings related to workplace flexibility. In June of 2011, the TRN published a report entitled The State of Telework in the U.S. (see Attachment D),<sup>2</sup> which integrates a large number of studies, surveys, and censuses to present the current state of telework in the United States. The report encompasses both the private and public sectors, as well as the resulting benefits of telework. According to the report, telecommuting is in much wider use in the private sector than in the public sector. However, use of telecommute (also referred to as telework) programs has increased in recent years in the public sector. A 2011 report also by TRN reviews the benefits and challenges of telecommuting in the California government workforce. While many of the cost-saving considerations would not apply to the AOC, the concept of remaining competitive and attracting a new generation of government leaders and talented staff is a fundamental goal of the AOC.<sup>3</sup> (See Attachment E.)

The TRN reports on their website that companies that implement telecommuting policies have seen a notable increase in productivity by their employees. Best Buy, British Telecom, Dow Chemical, and many others show that teleworkers are 35 to 40 percent more productive than non-telecommuters. More than two-thirds of employers have reported increased productivity among their teleworkers. Sun Microsystems' experience suggests that employees spend 60 percent of the commuting time they save performing work for the company. JD Edwards teleworkers are 20 to 25 percent more productive than their office counterparts. American Express workers produced 43 percent more than their office-based counterparts, and Compaq increased productivity by 15 to 45 percent.<sup>4</sup>

Because of technological advances in recent years, many employers, especially in the private sector, have found that enabling employees to telecommute has resulted in improvements in employee productivity, morale, and retention.

In addition to increased productivity, other benefits to both the employer and the employee have been associated with offering telework programs. These benefits include reduced absenteeism, retention of high-level employees who might otherwise choose to leave public employment due to work schedule inflexibility, and reduced commuter costs (see Lister & Harnish, infra, note 2).

Relevant telecommuting legislation

In recognition of the benefits of telecommute programs, legislation has been passed at the federal level and in the state of California encouraging telecommute programs for employees in positions where telecommuting is viable. The report 2012 Status of Telework in the Federal Government (see Attachment F) gives a detailed account of how the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 has transformed federal telework.<sup>5</sup>

In California, in 1990, Assembly Bill 2963 (Klehs; Stats. 1990, ch. 1389) added sections 14200 through 14203 to the Government Code, entitled “the State Employee Telecommuting Program,” authorizing state agencies to establish telecommuting programs as an element of transportation management programs. Four years later, Assembly Bill 2672 (Cortese; Stats. 1994, ch. 1209) amended section 14201 and added section 14200.1 to the Government Code “to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.” (Gov. Code, § 14200.1(b).) Section 14200.1 sets forth legislative findings, declarations, and intent:

- (a) The Legislature finds and declares the following:
  - (1) Telecommuting can be an important means to reduce air pollution and traffic congestion and to reduce the high costs of highway commuting.
  - (2) Telecommuting stimulates employee productivity while giving workers more flexibility and control over their lives.
- (b) It is the intent of the Legislature to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.

As amended, section 14201 deletes the earlier authorization and replaces it with a requirement that each state agency “shall review its work operations to determine where in its organization telecommuting can be of practical benefit to the agency [and] develop and implement a telecommuting plan as part of its telecommuting program in work areas where telecommuting is identified as being both practical and beneficial to the organization.”

Unintended negative consequences of telecommuting

According to the 2012 Status of Telework in the Federal Government report (see Attachment F, page 52), telecommuting can also have unintended negative consequences. Those cited in the report include the following:

- Potential for social and career isolation
- Reduced performance as a result of employee isolation
- Missed opportunities for meeting colleagues to allow for unplanned or serendipitous knowledge exchange
- Reduce overall sharing in workplaces

Implementation Requirements, Costs, and Operational Impacts

Option 1 implementation requirements. If option 1 is approved, the AOC will take the necessary steps to eliminate Policy 8.9 from the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual and will work with offices to inform current telecommuting staff and transition employees to perform their duties at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule. No other implementation requirements are needed.

Option 2 implementation requirements. If option 2 is approved, the AOC will take the necessary steps to amend Policy 8.9 to eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow AOC employees to telecommute on an ad hoc basis, based on special circumstances. HR will communicate the amended policy to all AOC staff and initiate steps to transition current regular telecommuting staff to perform their duties at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule. As previously indicated, HR has developed a process to track, monitor, and report on the use of ad hoc telecommuting within the AOC.

Option 3 implementation requirements. If option 3 is approved, the AOC will implement the proposed amended Policy 8.9 establishing strict controls and allowing for the approval, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding of telecommuting arrangements. HR will communicate the amended policy to all AOC staff and initiate steps to transition current regular telecommuting staff to be in compliance with the amended policy. HR has developed a process to track, monitor, and report on the use of regular and ad hoc telecommuting within the AOC. If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, a report on the status of telecommuting in the AOC will be provided in one year for review and further consideration.

Pilot Program 8.9

Pilot Program
Number: 8.9

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program

Contact: Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division, Human Resources Services Office

Program
Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work
  - (1) Applicability
  - (2) Request and Approval Process
  - (3) Remote Work Schedules
  - (4) Remote Work Log

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this pilot program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this pilot program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This pilot program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this pilot program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this pilot program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work Pilot Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work

(1) Applicability

Only non-supervisory AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable pilot program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work
How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously.

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the pilot program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee's review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (excluding supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this pilot program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on a monthly report that will be submitted to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee's primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. \(Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)\). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this pilot program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this pilot program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the Remote Work Application form (Attachment II) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC), Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) has prepared this six-month interim status report on the progress of Judicial Council Directive 26, which states that:

...the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC adheres to its telecommuting policy consistently and identifies and corrects all existing deviations and violations of the existing policy.

This report includes a six-month update of the pilot telecommuting program. It includes information on how the program was implemented, details on employee usage, how accountability has been monitored, and next steps in the process.

Previous Council Action

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council directed the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC consistently adhered to its existing telecommuting (working remotely) policy. The council also requested that the Administrative Director identify and correct all existing deviations from and violations of the existing policy.

On December 14, 2012, the council directed the Administrative Director to review Policy 8.9 (attachment 1), Working Remotely (Telecommuting), of the AOC Personnel and Policies Procedures Manual and provide the council with a report proposing any recommendations and amendments to the policy. The council also directed the Administrative Director to consider and report on alternatives—including whether this policy should remain in force—and return with a report and recommendations for the council’s February 2013 meeting.

During the February 2013 meeting, the Administrative Director requested, in his report, that the Judicial Council consider and approve one of the following options:

1. Eliminate all forms of telecommuting;
2. Eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or
3. Permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, including controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation.

The Judicial Council approved a twelve-month pilot of the proposed amended Policy 8.9 (attachment 2), Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program, authorizing employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee’s job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director. Included with the new pilot program, the council approved the use of ad hoc remote work arrangements, limited to no more than two workdays per month, when unknown business or personal needs arise.

The council directed that an interim report be provided to the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) following six months of implementation, and a full report be presented to the Judicial Council at the completion of the one-year pilot program.

Participant Data – Past and Present

The original policy allowed for up to eight days per month of telecommuting, and provided each office leader with discretion regarding any exceptions to the policy. In 2012, 98 employees (including supervisors and managers) participated in the Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Program, representing 454 remote working days per month. The telecommuting benefit for supervisors and managers was eliminated when the amended pilot program was implemented in March 2013.

Currently, under the pilot telecommute program, there are 69 individuals who have been approved to telecommute on a one-day-per-week basis, representing 276 remote workdays per month. This represents a 30 percent decrease in telecommute approvals and about a 40 percent decrease in the number of telecommute days utilized per month utilizing the criteria established by the Administrative Director.

Methodology and Process

Pilot Remote Work (Telecommute) Program Application Process

1. A transitional period was granted by the Administrative Director through May 31, 2013, to allow for an application period and to allow individuals on prior telecommute schedules time to adjust to the new policy parameters;
2. Employees were asked to submit applications to a central email account (pilot.telecommute@jud.ca.gov) for tracking and monitoring by HRSO;
3. The HRSO reviewed applications and submitted to the Administrative Director for final review and approval; and
4. If approved, employees began their one-day-per-week telecommute after June 3, 2013, on a date approved by their supervisors. Employees were also required to submit weekly logs describing work performed during their telecommute days.

All other aspects of the pilot program, such as ad hoc telecommuting, became effective on March 1, 2013.

Ad hoc Telecommute Program

The ad hoc telecommute program is a separate component of the pilot program, offering employees the ability to work remotely no more than two days per month when extenuating circumstances arise. The ad hoc telecommute program is only available to individuals who do not participate in the regular pilot telecommute program.

Special Circumstances Affecting Employees' Commutes

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the BART Strike

In early July 2013, a special circumstance occurred when the employees of the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) went on strike, which resulted in a shutdown of one of the main public transportation services utilized by staff to commute to and from the San Francisco office. During this period, the AOC Executive Office authorized individuals who were directly impacted by the strike to ad hoc telecommute on the first two days of the BART closure.

This exception also applied to individuals who participated in the regular pilot telecommute program; however, no individual employee was allowed to telecommute more than two days during this particular week. Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special BART telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the Bay Bridge Closure

In early September 2013, a special circumstance occurred when the Bay Bridge was closed due to the road changes related to the opening of the new eastern span of the bridge. The closure was expected to create heavy traffic and congested public transit. During this period, the AOC Executive Office provided individuals with options that would meet the work needs of the AOC while trying to alleviate the commute during the period of the bridge closure.

The options provided during the bridge closure included: 1) the ability to allow up to two ad hoc telecommute days for those individuals not participating in the pilot program; 2) the ability to shift the regular telecommute day to a day impacted by the bridge closure (for those participating in the pilot program); 3) the ability to work a flexible work schedule to avoid heavy commute periods; or 4) the ability to utilize available accruals to take time off during impacted days.

Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special Bridge Closure telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the Second BART Strike

In late October 2013, BART employees participated in a second strike, which, once again, resulted in a shutdown of one of the main public transportation services utilized by staff to commute to and from the San Francisco office. This closure of the public transportation system was anticipated and the AOC Executive Office authorized the following options to ease the commute burden on employees: 1) the use of the two ad hoc telecommute days, as allowed by policy to those individuals who were not participating in the pilot telecommute program; 2) allow those on the pilot telecommute program to shift their one telecommute day within that same week; 3) allow employees to adopt a flexible work schedule as permitted by business needs and supervisor approval; or 4) allow employees to use available accrued leave as permitted by business need and supervisor approval.

During the second BART strike, supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special BART telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Use of Work Logs

Individuals who participate in the pilot program are required to submit a weekly remote work log to the supervisor of the unit. This log includes a listing of the duties/tasks completed during the designated remote workday.

Sample Duties and Tasks Reported on Work Logs

Work logs have been collected from participants of the pilot program and those who worked remotely on an ad hoc basis during any of the special circumstances previously listed. The most common remote work duties or tasks reported included:

- Reviewing documents, researching (project based, legal research and data collection), analyzing data;
- Preparing for projects (presentations, timeline development, and curriculum development);
- Responding to communications (email and phone);
- Participating in conference calls; and
- Writing and editing reports.

Duties specific to a particular office were also listed, but were less common on the logs. The HRSO reviews the logs regularly and contacts individual supervisors with any questions or concerns regarding the content of the log or the duties/tasks performed. Supervisors and managers who had participants in either the pilot program or the ad hoc program were satisfied with both the quality and quantity of work provided during the remote work periods.

Policy and Cost Implications

It was determined that part-time employees, employees acting in a senior-level or lead capacity, and employees requiring direct supervision were not allowed to participate in pilot telecommute program, as the essential duties of their positions required their presence at the workplace.

Part-time Employees

For employees on a part-time schedule—as they are already unavailable one to three days per week—any additional time out of the workplace would further affect productivity.

Employees Acting in a Senior-level or Lead Capacity

Employees in a senior-level role—which involves regularly interacting with staff, sharing their knowledge and skills, and providing guidance—are critical to the daily operations of the AOC. Working remotely inhibits the ability of a person in this role to provide onsite guidance and face-to-face interaction.

Employees Requiring Direct Supervision

Most classifications identify the amount of supervision expected during the workday. If the phrase “works under direct supervision” is listed in an employee’s job classification, then that employee is expected to be present in the workplace to provide customer support under the guidance of the lead or supervisor. Additionally, if an employee’s regular presence in the workplace is integral to the functions of the unit, it is likely that the application will be denied by the Administrative Director.

Summary of Findings

- In the initial application period (March 1, 2013, through March 29, 2013) there were 105 applications received from employees, with a desire to telecommute one day per week.
- Upon review of those applications, the Administrative Director made certain policy determinations, as outlined in the Policy and Cost Implications section above, resulting in the approval of 63 of the applications for participation in the program and the denial of 42.
- As a result of feedback from the Management Council, the Administrative Director directed the HRSO to provide all offices with an updated application process—incorporating the policy determinations that would be utilized moving forward. Application packets were sent to all members of the Management Council on May 29, 2013.
- All new and resubmitted applications included a detailed job description listing the job duties that could be effectively performed remotely.

As a result of this amended process, one new application was submitted and five employees<sup>1</sup> resubmitted their applications to telecommute. Based on the application materials, recommendations from the supervisor, office leader and the HRSO, all six individuals were approved by the Administrative Director for one day per week telecommuting, in accordance with the pilot program parameters. These additional approvals resulted in a total of 106 applicants, 69 approvals and 37 denials.

Pilot Remote Work (Telecommute) Program Results

As of September 3, 2013, 69 individuals have been approved to telecommute through the pilot program, representing approximately 9.6 percent of current AOC staff. The chart below illustrates the number of participants from the various AOC offices:

Next Steps

The HRSO will continue to review the telecommute logs to monitor appropriate quantities of work and the types of duties/tasks performed.

The HRSO will continue to review and make recommendations to the Administrative Director for any new applications requesting to participate in the pilot program.

Regular reports will be provided to the Administrative Director on the number of employees participating in the program, both on the Remote Work (Telecommute) Program and the Ad Hoc Telecommute Program.

Future reports will include any special circumstances affecting employees' commutes.

Summary of Changes to Policy 8.9

The following chart summarizes revisions to Policy 8.9 and describes the controls and tracking mechanisms used in the more restrictive regular and ad hoc pilot programs.

	Regular Pilot Telecommute Program	Ad Hoc Telecommute Program
Defined eligibility requirements.	The AOC Executive Office restricted application of the program in comparison with the previous program and determined that part-time employees, employees acting in a senior-level or lead capacity, and employees requiring general supervision would not be allowed to participate in the pilot telecommute program as the essential duties of their positions required their presence at the workplace.	The AOC Human Resources Services Office reviewed requests to ensure that employees who were participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program were not, at the same time, working from home on an “ad hoc” basis.
Lower utilization rates.	With the implementation of the regular pilot policy, the AOC experienced a 33 percent decrease in telecommute participants from 2012 and an approximate 42 percent decrease in the number of telecommute days utilized per month.	The previous ad hoc program was not measured. In the current pilot program, the average ad hoc telecommute usage within the entire AOC has averaged approximately 36 days per month, representing less than one percent of staff work time spent ad hoc telecommuting. Well more than half of that usage occurred during three disruptive events in the Bay Area.
Centralized application and review process allowed for consistent application of the policy throughout the AOC.	In the previous policy, division directors were given the authority to approve or deny participation. Under the new pilot program, the decision is made by the Administrative Director.  The AOC received 105 applications for the regular pilot program. Upon review, the Administrative Director made certain policy determinations, resulting in only 65 employees currently participating in the program.	New to the pilot program, each office leader reviewed and approved each request for ad hoc telecommuting.

Attachment E:

Arming managers and supervisors with the tools necessary to address special circumstances.		During special circumstances in the past, division directors had the discretion to offer employees various options, which contributed to inconsistencies. When special circumstances occurred during the pilot period that required exceptional considerations, the Executive Office further defined consistent parameters agency wide of the ad hoc program to allow for flexibility while operating within the parameters of the policy.
Tracking and monitoring.	Participants submit work logs to their supervisors for review on a monthly basis. Work logs may be audited at any time to ensure that the duties performed while telecommuting are appropriate and sufficient for a full day's work.	The centralized review process allowed tracking of the utilization of the ad hoc remote work days. The AOC Human Resources Services Office examined patterns of usage and potential usage by employees who were not qualified to ad hoc telecommute.

Human Resources Services Office

Program Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this ~~pilot~~ program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this ~~pilot~~ program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This ~~pilot~~ program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this ~~pilot~~ program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this ~~pilot~~ program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work ~~Pilot~~ Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(1) Applicability

Only ~~non-supervisory full-time~~ AOC employees (regular or temporary, ~~full-time or part-time~~, exempt or non-exempt) not serving in a supervisory or lead capacity or whose job description does not require general supervision may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable ~~pilot~~ program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work

How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Office leaders are expected to review each application with the expectation that services not be impacted as a result of telecommuting. As such, each office must strive to achieve a balance in ensuring that employees are readily available at all times.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously. HR will also consider the following when reviewing applications:

- Requested telecommute day
What is the requested telecommute day and are there coworkers telecommuting?
- Current division and unit balance
How many pilot program participants does the office currently have in relation to office and unit totals?
- Ability to handle scheduled and unexpected leaves
Will the office have coverage in times of scheduled days off or unexpected absences?
- Performance Improvement Plan (PIP)
Is the employee currently on a PIP? Has the employee had past performance issues?

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the ~~pilot~~ program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee’s review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees Full-time employees (excluding leads, supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including part-time employees, leads, managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, extenuating circumstances such as the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this ~~pilot~~ program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

~~“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. intended to provide an ability to work remotely during special circumstance situations and are not meant to supplant the remote working program. “Ad Hoc” remote work situations are limited to a maximum of two days per month in any given month. Quarterly reports are provided to the Executive Office for review. Unusually high utilization or patterns of usage by an office or an individual may result in suspension of the “Ad Hoc” opportunity at the discretion of the Administrative Director.~~

Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working-request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership ~~may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on~~ shall submit a monthly usage report ~~that will be submitted~~ to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee’s primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. \(Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)\). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following:

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this ~~pilot~~ program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this ~~pilot~~ program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the ~~Remote Work Application form (Attachment H)~~ Remote Work Application form \(Attachment I\) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements, including renewals, must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee prior to commencement of the remote work schedule. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

The Administrative Director of the Courts requests that the Judicial Council consider and approve one of the following options concerning telecommuting. In addition, the Administrative Director confirms that all 85 telecommuting staff are currently in compliance with the existing policy and has prepared a report containing options for consideration by the Judicial Council. The report contains options to: (1) eliminate all forms of telecommuting; (2) eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or (3) permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, which contains controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation. If the revised telecommute policy is approved, a follow-up report will be provided to the Judicial Council in one year.

Previous Council Action

In August 2012, the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) recommended that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require compliance with the requirements and policies of the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual, including compliance with the rules limiting telecommuting, specifically concerning Policy 8.9 Working

Remotely (Telecommuting). As a response to that directive, the Administrative Director confirmed that all 85 telecommuting staff are in compliance with the existing policy and, in consultation with the AOC Executive Office and office directors, proposed amendments to the policy to address implementation and compliance concerns stated in a report presented by E&P to the council at its August 31, 2012, meeting.

At its December 2012 meeting, E&P further proposed an amendment to Judicial Council directive 26 to enlarge its scope to include the question of whether a telecommute program should remain in force. The proposed revisions to Policy 8.9 and options outlined in this report respond to the amended directive for discussion at the council’s February 2013 meeting.

Current Status

There are 85 regular employees in compliance with the current Policy 8.9 who have been approved for telecommuting within the AOC. The chart below lists the eight AOC offices that currently participate in the program.

Participating Offices	Count of Participating Employees	% of Total AOC Population
Center for Families, Children & the Courts	27	3.76%
Center for Judiciary Education and Research	11	1.53%
Court Operations Special Services Office	9	1.25%
Criminal Justice Court Services Office	3	.42%
Information Technology Services Office	19	2.65%
Judicial Council Support Services	1	.14%
Legal Services Office	11	1.53%
Trial Court Liaison Office	4	.56%
Grand Total	85	11.84%

The following ten offices do not currently participate in the regular telecommuting program.

Non - Participating Offices
Judicial Branch Capital Program Office	Office of Communications	Special Projects Office
Fiscal Services Office	Office of Governmental Affairs	Trial Court Administrative Services Office
Human Resources Services Office	Office of Security
Office of Administrative Services	Office of Real Estate & Facilities Management

Of the 718 regular employees only 85 regular employees have been approved to participate in the program, representing 11.84 percent of the AOC regular workforce. The remaining 633 regular employees work the standard workweek in an assigned AOC work location.

Duties approved for telecommuting

Office leadership have considered and approved regular telecommute schedules depending upon various job responsibilities, including performing legal research, drafting legal opinions, analyzing data, writing reports, and providing network support/administration. Examples of such duties/responsibilities include:

- Legal research to update legal publications, course curricula, and online courses
- Research, data analysis, and report writing connected with advisory committee or other group work
- Configuring, administering, and supporting network and server infrastructure
- Creating lesson plans, developing PowerPoint presentations, and meeting via phone with planning committees
- Writing content for online courses, writing scripts for broadcasts (for both judges and court staff), and drafting reports
- Writing, editing, and generating technical documents
- Preparing and reviewing grant applications, including the preparation of budget sheets and forecasts

Duties not approved for telecommuting

Not all employees have been deemed suitable to participate in the telecommute program due to the nature of the work assigned. Employees who have been deemed ineligible for a regular telecommute schedule include those whose job responsibilities require them to be present in the AOC offices. Examples of such duties/responsibilities include:

- Processing of daily Court-Appointed Counsel compensation claims (which requires specialized software and face-to-face interaction with Accounting staff)
- Handling daily intake of retired judge assignment requests (which requires access to specialized software and constant telephone access)
- Processing of payroll or benefit information (which requires restricted access to the State Controller's Office system) and employee relations interactions (which are best handled in a face-to-face meeting)
- Setting up new computers, delivering them to employees, repairing malfunctioning computers, and processing end-of-life equipment for reutilization/disposal
- Coordinating logistics for judicial education programs (which requires being available to a number of CJER staff)
- Managing the logistics of securing meeting rooms, lodging, and other requirements for education programs and meetings
- Hands-on consulting with other employees in specific subject matter areas, such as instructional design or WebEx support

Additional reasons why employees have not been allowed to telecommute include:

- Employees on a performance improvement plan who require supervision, assessment, and development on site
- Managers and supervisors who need to be available to their staff on as-needed basis

Options for Consideration and Policy Implications

Option 1: Eliminate all forms of telecommuting

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be eliminated and telecommuting, both on a regular schedule and on an ad hoc basis, would no longer be permitted in the AOC.

Benefits of adopting option 1

Improved perception/reputation. By eliminating all forms of telecommuting, AOC staff will be available at all times to assist their customers within the Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal, and the trial courts. The AOC has been under public scrutiny to reform and restructure its current practices/policies. Elimination of the telecommuting program enables the AOC to strengthen its reputation with the trial courts and the public.

Ability to supervise employees on site; employee availability. Under a telecommuting program not strictly managed and controlled by a centralized oversight group, there may be a perception of little to no supervision of employees on telecommuting arrangements. By eliminating this option, it eliminates this perception and thereby ensures that all employees on site are properly supervised by their supervisor or manager. Elimination of the telecommuting program will have AOC employees at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule, with the exception of the one day per month mandatory furlough.

Consistency with most written trial court policies. Most trial courts have not adopted a formal telecommute policy for their employees. Elimination of the policy places the AOC on equal terms with the trial courts and reduces the perception of unavailability.

All offices treated the same regardless of the nature of work. The wide latitude of telecommuting arrangements within the AOC, as allowed under the current Policy 8.9, has resulted in different applications of the policy across all offices. By eliminating the ability to telecommute, employees will be treated the same regardless of their duties and responsibilities.

Challenges of adopting option 1

Reduced motivation potentially leading to reduced performance. The ability to telecommute is a very important job benefit to those who participate in the program. Complete elimination of the program could result in less-motivated employees, which could have a direct effect on job performance and productivity.

Retention issues—potential for losing quality workforce. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for remote working. If the work from home program is eliminated, it could result in a loss of quality employees to competing employers. It could also influence future ability to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Employees will perceive this as another take-away. Over the past four years employees have endured several changes in the workplace that have been perceived by the employees as “take-aways.” While many changes have been a direct result of the economic downturn, others, such as this program, are “no-cost” benefits. Removing such a benefit would most likely be perceived by employees as yet another take-away, with a corresponding direct impact on employee morale.

Potential increased commute cost to employees. Employees who currently work remotely are relieved of the time and cost of commuting for the day(s) they work from home. For example, a commuter from the East Bay could save 45 minutes each way to and from work, as well as $6 to $10 per day in transportation costs. An individual participating in a one day per week remote work assignment would have an increased cost of $24 to $40 per month and will spend approximately 6 additional hours per month commuting.

Ability of the AOC to offer comparable employee benefits in the competitive San Francisco labor market. AOC HR contacted employers within the San Francisco Bay Area to determine what, if any, telecommuting programs they offer to their employees. Of the public entities contacted, the City and County of San Francisco, Superior Court of San Francisco County, San Francisco State University, and University of California, San Francisco offer some form of telecommuting. Of the private entities contacted, Adobe, Charles Schwab, Gap, Inc., and Yahoo! also offer some form of telecommuting. Based on information gathered, it appears that remote working has become a standard practice among major San Francisco employers and is a highly desired benefit of job seekers. To continue to be competitive in the San Francisco labor market, it is critical to develop and maintain programs that meet the business needs of the organization to attract and retain quality staff.

Option 2: Eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be revised to only allow for limited, ad hoc telecommuting not to exceed two days in any given month. In this option telecommuting would only be allowed under special circumstances that would meet the business needs of the AOC. For example, an individual who is on vacation at home and unable to come to the office is required to complete an unexpected project by close of business. That individual could be approved to work from home on that day so the project can be completed and the individual credited with the work time utilized.

Oversight of this option would be granted to office leadership, with monthly ad hoc telecommute reports submitted to the Human Resources Services Office for tracking and review. A quarterly utilization report would be provided to the Administrative Director.

Benefits of adopting option 2

Improved perception/reputation. Elimination of regular telecommuting and the restriction of the program to only include remote work on an ad hoc basis may reduce the negative perception of the AOC telecommuting program. This restriction of the telecommuting program enables the AOC to strengthen its reputation with the trial courts and the public.

Allows for flexibility in meeting critical business needs. While this option does not provide for a regularly scheduled work from home day, it does provide the AOC with the ability to approve limited, one-time, as-needed remote work that would meet a specific, critical business need.

Consistent with some trial court practices. While many trial courts do not have a formal written remote work policy, some trial courts do allow an ad hoc type of work from home program. Some trial courts have allowed staff to work from home to complete a report, a project, and research or data analysis in a quieter, less interrupted setting.

Challenges of adopting option 2

Negative perception/reputation. The AOC has been under public scrutiny to reform and restructure its current practices/policies. Allowing for even ad hoc telecommuting does not completely address the perception that the AOC is unavailable to address trial courts' needs in a timely fashion.

Reduced motivation leading to reduced performance (for individuals who have lost a regular telecommute schedule). The ability to telecommute is a very important job benefit to those who participate in the program. Elimination of the regular remote work program and replacing it with a much more restrictive ad hoc program could result in less-motivated employees and could have a direct effect on job performance and productivity.

Retention issues—potential for losing quality workforce. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for regular remote working. If the work from home program is reduced to an ad hoc program, it could result in a loss of quality employees to competing employers. It could also influence future ability to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Employees will perceive this as another take-away. Over the past four years employees have endured several changes in the workplace that have been perceived by the employees as “take-aways.” While many changes have been a direct result of the economic downturn, others, such as this program, are “no-cost” benefits. The severe restricting of such a benefit would likely be perceived by employees as yet another take-away potentially having a direct impact on employee morale.

Potential increased commute cost to employee. Employees who currently work remotely are relieved of the time and cost of commuting for the day(s) they work from home. For example, a commuter from the East Bay could save 45 minutes each way to and from work, as well as $6 to $10 per day in transportation costs. An individual participating in a one day per week remote work assignment would have an increased cost of $24 to $40 per month and will spend approximately 6 additional hours per month commuting.

Option 3: Permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, which contains controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation in the telecommute program

If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, Policy 8.9 would be revised to the more restrictive policy outlined below.

The proposed Policy 8.9 contains a number of revisions that, if incorporated, address many of the concerns raised. For example, it narrows the scope of the telework policy to nonsupervisory positions, limits the number of days a person can utilize ad hoc or regular telecommuting, and prohibits a combination of ad hoc and regular telecommuting.

Further, to address accountability issues, it includes tracking procedures. AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work remotely. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Additionally, HR would provide a review of the application process and provide recommendations to the Administrative Director or designee for final consideration/approval. This process is designed to ensure that all participants meet and adhere to policy guidelines.

Comparison between current and proposed

The goal is to design a program that is in the best public interest and that benefits the employees, while addressing the challenges identified, i.e., how to measure productivity for the employees who work from home, how to determine what positions are suitable for telecommuting, and how to fairly implement the policy.

The chart below illustrates the differences between the current policy and the proposed policy:

Criteria	Current Policy	Proposed Policy
Employment eligibility	After 6 months of employment	After 12 months of employment
Limits definition of “Home” location	None	Restricts “Home” location to one in the state of California

Limits number of regularly scheduled telecommute days	Up to 8 days per month	No more than 1 day per week in any given week
Limits participation in regular remote work program	None	Limited to only nonsupervisory AOC employees
Limits participation in ad hoc telecommute days	None	Limited to 2 days per month in any given month; available to all AOC employees; not available to employees on a regular telecommute schedule
Consideration/review process	Office leadership discretion	1. Office leadership review, 2. Human Resources review, 3. Administrative Director/designee approval
Factors for approval consideration	Office leadership discretion	Defined consideration factors: 1. Nature of work, 2. Quantity of work, 3. Quality of work, 4. Timeliness, 5. Ability to handle multiple priorities
Approval authority	Office leadership approval	Administrative Director/designee approval
Allowable exceptions	Office leadership discretion	None (except for reasonable accommodations for a disability consistent with law)
Work logs maintained	None	Required for each regularly scheduled remote work day
Tracking of ad hoc telecommute days	None	Tracking required for each day of ad hoc remote work by office leadership and Human Resources
Frequency of productivity monitoring	Annually	Continuing duty of office leadership

The amended policy recognizes the potential benefits of an organized, managed remote work program, and the revisions reflect an emphasis on accessibility, transparency, and consistency. The final amended policy includes two key components that address these themes: availability of staff to address inquiries from internal customers, the courts, and the public; and the assignment of a centralized unit to oversee and manage the telework program.

Benefits of adopting option 3

Increased productivity. Overall productivity may be improved because the more desirable and attractive working conditions result in higher levels of employee motivation. A number of companies that have implemented telecommuting in the workplace have seen increased productivity in their employees.<sup>1</sup>

Work/life balance and employee motivation. Employees perceive the remote working opportunity as a workplace benefit. Employees appreciate and will recognize the efforts by the AOC to maintain attractive work benefits in a challenging economic time.

Work environment. The nature of work appropriate for remote working situations is best served in quiet, uninterrupted settings where quality thinking can occur. The lack of interruptions can not only expedite the completion of a project, but can also increase the quality of the finished product.

Increased monitoring. The utilization of work logs demonstrates the quality and quantity of work performed, which can potentially lead to an increase in productivity.

Employee retention and recruitment. Several employees have expressed that this “benefit” is an important aspect of their decision to be employed at the AOC. In the San Francisco job market most employers, public and private, allow for remote working. This option could allow the AOC to recruit quality individuals in a competitive job market.

Emulates state policies and legislation that encourage utilization of telecommute programs. Government Code section 14200.1(b): “It is the intent of the Legislature to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.” The standard template for telecommute policy utilized by the state agencies is provided on the Department of General Services website at: <http://www.dgs.ca.gov/dgs/ProgramsServices/telework.aspx>

Challenges of adopting option 3

Perception of monitoring, supervising, and evaluating off-site employees. Under any telecommuting program, there may be a perception of little to no supervision of employees on telecommuting arrangements. Telecommuting may make it more challenging to review the work product on a regular basis to ensure productivity standards are being met.

Limits face-to-face interaction/exchange of information. Working from home could reduce the interpersonal, collaborative relationships necessary for the development of a sound work product.

Impacts on non-telecommuting employees. If regular telecommuting is continued, the AOC will continue to have employees whose job responsibilities prohibit them from participation. For these employees there may be a perception of disparity.

Information on current telecommute practices, public and private

The Telework Research Network (TRN) is an independent consulting and research organization that publishes findings related to workplace flexibility. In June of 2011, the TRN published a report entitled The State of Telework in the U.S. (see Attachment D),<sup>2</sup> which integrates a large number of studies, surveys, and censuses to present the current state of telework in the United States. The report encompasses both the private and public sectors, as well as the resulting benefits of telework. According to the report, telecommuting is in much wider use in the private sector than in the public sector. However, use of telecommute (also referred to as telework) programs has increased in recent years in the public sector. A 2011 report also by TRN reviews the benefits and challenges of telecommuting in the California government workforce. While many of the cost-saving considerations would not apply to the AOC, the concept of remaining competitive and attracting a new generation of government leaders and talented staff is a fundamental goal of the AOC.<sup>3</sup> (See Attachment E.)

The TRN reports on their website that companies that implement telecommuting policies have seen a notable increase in productivity by their employees. Best Buy, British Telecom, Dow Chemical, and many others show that teleworkers are 35 to 40 percent more productive than non-telecommuters. More than two-thirds of employers have reported increased productivity among their teleworkers. Sun Microsystems' experience suggests that employees spend 60 percent of the commuting time they save performing work for the company. JD Edwards teleworkers are 20 to 25 percent more productive than their office counterparts. American Express workers produced 43 percent more than their office-based counterparts, and Compaq increased productivity by 15 to 45 percent.<sup>4</sup>

Because of technological advances in recent years, many employers, especially in the private sector, have found that enabling employees to telecommute has resulted in improvements in employee productivity, morale, and retention.

In addition to increased productivity, other benefits to both the employer and the employee have been associated with offering telework programs. These benefits include reduced absenteeism, retention of high-level employees who might otherwise choose to leave public employment due to work schedule inflexibility, and reduced commuter costs (see Lister & Harnish, infra, note 2).

Relevant telecommuting legislation

In recognition of the benefits of telecommute programs, legislation has been passed at the federal level and in the state of California encouraging telecommute programs for employees in positions where telecommuting is viable. The report 2012 Status of Telework in the Federal Government (see Attachment F) gives a detailed account of how the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 has transformed federal telework.<sup>5</sup>

In California, in 1990, Assembly Bill 2963 (Klehs; Stats. 1990, ch. 1389) added sections 14200 through 14203 to the Government Code, entitled “the State Employee Telecommuting Program,” authorizing state agencies to establish telecommuting programs as an element of transportation management programs. Four years later, Assembly Bill 2672 (Cortese; Stats. 1994, ch. 1209) amended section 14201 and added section 14200.1 to the Government Code “to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.” (Gov. Code, § 14200.1(b).) Section 14200.1 sets forth legislative findings, declarations, and intent:

- (a) The Legislature finds and declares the following:
  - (1) Telecommuting can be an important means to reduce air pollution and traffic congestion and to reduce the high costs of highway commuting.
  - (2) Telecommuting stimulates employee productivity while giving workers more flexibility and control over their lives.
- (b) It is the intent of the Legislature to encourage state agencies to adopt policies that encourage telecommuting by state employees.

As amended, section 14201 deletes the earlier authorization and replaces it with a requirement that each state agency “shall review its work operations to determine where in its organization telecommuting can be of practical benefit to the agency [and] develop and implement a telecommuting plan as part of its telecommuting program in work areas where telecommuting is identified as being both practical and beneficial to the organization.”

Unintended negative consequences of telecommuting

According to the 2012 Status of Telework in the Federal Government report (see Attachment F, page 52), telecommuting can also have unintended negative consequences. Those cited in the report include the following:

- Potential for social and career isolation
- Reduced performance as a result of employee isolation
- Missed opportunities for meeting colleagues to allow for unplanned or serendipitous knowledge exchange
- Reduce overall sharing in workplaces

Implementation Requirements, Costs, and Operational Impacts

Option 1 implementation requirements. If option 1 is approved, the AOC will take the necessary steps to eliminate Policy 8.9 from the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual and will work with offices to inform current telecommuting staff and transition employees to perform their duties at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule. No other implementation requirements are needed.

Option 2 implementation requirements. If option 2 is approved, the AOC will take the necessary steps to amend Policy 8.9 to eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow AOC employees to telecommute on an ad hoc basis, based on special circumstances. HR will communicate the amended policy to all AOC staff and initiate steps to transition current regular telecommuting staff to perform their duties at an AOC worksite on a standard work schedule. As previously indicated, HR has developed a process to track, monitor, and report on the use of ad hoc telecommuting within the AOC.

Option 3 implementation requirements. If option 3 is approved, the AOC will implement the proposed amended Policy 8.9 establishing strict controls and allowing for the approval, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding of telecommuting arrangements. HR will communicate the amended policy to all AOC staff and initiate steps to transition current regular telecommuting staff to be in compliance with the amended policy. HR has developed a process to track, monitor, and report on the use of regular and ad hoc telecommuting within the AOC. If this option is approved by the Judicial Council, a report on the status of telecommuting in the AOC will be provided in one year for review and further consideration.

Policy Number: 8.9

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting)

Contact: Human Resources Division, Policy Development Unit

Policy

Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program provides employees the opportunity to work from home when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the employee's division director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Applicability
- (C) Request and Approval Process
- (D) Remote Work Schedules
- (E) The Home Office
  - (1) Work Environment
  - (2) Office Equipment
  - (3) Information Security
  - (4) Health and Safety
- (F) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities
- (G) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

The AOC recognizes the potential management and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. This policy does not intend to cover employees working remotely due to work-related travel.

(B) Applicability

Only AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program.

(C) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the division director to approve or decline the request. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the division director. In making this determination, the division director will consider work-related criteria, including:

- The employee's job functions and feasibility of performing work away from the office;

- Degree of supervision required;
- The performance and work habits of the employee;
- Business needs, including work demands of the employee's unit; and
- Suitability of proposed home work environment.

A request to participate in the remote work program may be approved only when the division director determines that, while working remotely, the employee can perform all the duties and responsibilities of the position in a productive, efficient, and satisfactory manner that is consistent with the needs of the organization. Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Requests to work remotely as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor or the Human Resources Division, Integrated Disability Management Unit.

The Remote Worker's Agreement and Remote Work Checklist must be signed as indicated before remote working begins.

(D) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (including supervisors and managers) may be approved to work remotely as follows:

- During the first three months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After three months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work remotely up to a maximum of four days per month.
- After six successful months of participation in the remote work program, employees are eligible to request to work remotely up to a maximum of eight days per month.

Any exceptions to the above scheduling guidelines are at the discretion of the division director, in advance consultation with the Director of Human Resources. The remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- Remote workers may request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working remotely.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.

- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(C)(1)).
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day.

An employee may also be approved to work remotely on an "ad hoc" basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs.

(E) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee's primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working remotely. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(B)). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Services Division does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working remotely.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Services Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working remotely. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Services HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work remotely or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working remotely, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Division, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(F) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6, and AOC Computer Use Best Practices. In addition to AOC requirements on time reporting (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(D)), remote workers may be required to submit work logs of time spent and work performed while working remotely, at the discretion of their supervisor.

(G) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this policy may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment.

The Remote Work Application should be discussed and renewed annually, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it is not in the best interests of the AOC or the employee.

Participation in the remote work program is approved based on specific criteria considered by the division director on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Policy Number: 8.9 (Proposed)

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting)

Contact: Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division, Human Resources Services Office

Policy

Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work
  - (1) Applicability
  - (2) Request and Approval Process
  - (3) Remote Work Schedules
  - (4) Remote Work Log
- (C) Ad Hoc Remote Work
- (D) The Home Office
  - (1) Work Environment
  - (2) Office Equipment
  - (3) Information Security
  - (4) Health and Safety
- (E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities
- (F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this policy refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this policy shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This policy covers two types of remote work options:

(1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this policy), and

(2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this policy).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work Program Policy does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work

(1) Applicability

Only non-supervisory AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable policy criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work
How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously.

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of policies will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee's review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (excluding supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(C)(1)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this policy and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on a monthly report that will be submitted to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee's primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(B)). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this policy may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this policy.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the Remote Work Application form (Attachment II) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this paper is to shed light on when and where work is done in the U.S., how that's changed in recent years, and where the trend might be headed.

But there's a problem. "The task of trying to make sense of the various government sources of work at home data is a statistical Vietnam," said Bruce Phillips while he was senior fellow at the National Federation of Independent Business Research Foundation. "The data goes in, but you can't get it out."

Part of the problem is a matter of terminology. So to make sure there's no confusion, the focus of this report is on those who work at home (or in some cases elsewhere) and are not self-employed—neither as a sole proprietor or in an incorporated business)—in other words, employees who telecommute, or 'workshift' as some say. To avoid constant repetition throughout this paper, unless otherwise noted, the words 'work-at-home' (WAH) and the term 'workshift' refer to employees who fit the above conditions.

No one would disagree that the U.S. workforce is increasingly mobile. But, beyond that broad statement, we know little about the rate of increase in mobility—how often people are out of the office, where they are, and what they're doing. For that matter, there's no agreed-upon method of defining who they are.

Do you include an employee who takes work home on weekends as someone who works from home? What about a plumber who has an office at home, but earns his living only when he's on the road? Does it matter whether a person who works at home is employed by a private company, employed by the government, or is self-employed? What about an unpaid family worker, do we include him or her? How do you categorize a mobile worker who works at client locations, in their car, or at a coffee shop? Does someone who works remotely one day a week belong in the same statistical bucket as someone who works at home all the time?

If we could answer these questions and collect consistent data about how and where people work, it would help business leaders:

- ▶ Better understand their facilities' needs, increase workspace efficiency, and reduce real estate overhead
- ▶ Evaluate their IT readiness and the communications, collaboration, and technology needs of their workforce
- ▶ Effectively integrate employee mobility into hiring, training, and management paradigms
- ▶ Develop and market products and services that support remote work
- ▶ Better address the special needs of the disabled, of military families, and of caregivers

For city, state, and federal leaders, a better understanding of workforce mobility could help them:

- ▶ Evaluate the extent to which home-based work can reduce traffic congestion and greenhouse gases in their communities
- ▶ Solve regional issues such as outbound workforce migrations, talent shortages, and labor force mismatches

- ▶ Understand the ROI of broadband investments
- ▶ Reduce the offshoring of jobs
- ▶ Encourage populations to work and shop where they live
- ▶ Help establish laws to encourage home-based work and abolish those that discourage it
- ▶ Help understand the role that work-at-home programs could play in transportation demand management, energy conservation, and greenhouse gas emissions
- ▶ Reduce un- and under-employment
- ▶ Increase productivity
- ▶ Save money

Until now, some of the most informative data about when and where people work have been buried in nearly impenetrable jungle of databases. We've hacked our way through them, and made some surprising discoveries.

We hope you'll find The State of Telework in the U.S. both interesting and informative. What's more, we hope it will leave at least some of you wanting more because there is still much we don't know about the growing population of anytime, anywhere workers.

KEY FINDINGS

Unless otherwise noted, all telecommuter statistics refer to non-self-employed people who principally work from home.

- ▶ Forty-five percent of the US workforce holds a job that is compatible with at least part-time telework.
- ▶ Fifty million U.S. employees who want to work from home hold jobs that are telework compatible though only 2.9 million consider home their primary place of work (2.3% of the workforce).
- ▶ The existing 2.9 million US telecommuters save 390 million gallons of gas and prevent the release of 3.6 million tons of greenhouse gases yearly.
- ▶ If those with compatible jobs worked at home 2.4 days a week (the national average of those who do), the reduction in greenhouse gases (51 million tons) would be equivalent of taking the entire New York workforce off the roads.
- ▶ The national savings would total over $900 billion a year; enough to reduce our Persian Gulf oil imports by 46%.
- ▶ The energy saved annually from telecommuting could exceed the output of all renewable energy sources combined.
- ▶ Regular telecommuting grew by 61% between 2005 and 2009. During the same period, home-based self-employment grew by 1.7%.
- ▶ Based on current trends, with no growth acceleration, regular telecommuters will total 4.9 million by 2016, a 69% increase from the current level but well below other forecasts.
- ▶ Seventy-six percent of telecommuters work for private sector companies, down from 81% in 2005—the difference is largely attributable to increased WAH among state and federal workers.
- ▶ Using home as a 'reasonable accommodation' per the Americans with Disabilities Act, 316,000 people regularly work from home.
- ▶ The typical telecommuter is a 49-year-old, college-educated, salaried, non-union employee in a management or professional role, earning $58,000 a year at a company with more than 100 employees.

- ▶ Relative to the total population, a disproportionate share of management, professional, sales and office workers telecommute.
- ▶ Non-exempt employees are far less likely to work at home on a regular or ad hoc basis than salaried employees.
- ▶ Over 75% of employees who work from home earn over $65,000 per year, putting them in the upper 80 percentile relative to all employees.
- ▶ Larger companies are more likely to allow telecommuting than smaller ones.
- ▶ Non-union organizations are more likely to offer telecommuting than those with unions.
- ▶ In a quarter of the nation's 20 largest metro areas, more people now telecommute than use public transportation as their "principal means of transportation to work."
- ▶ There is no positive correlation between cities with the worst congestion or longest round-trip commutes and the extent of telework. For example, among the largest 15 metro areas, New York had the third lowest percent of regular telecommuters (2.1%).
- ▶ Among the 15 largest U.S. metro areas, San Diego-Carlsbad-San Marcos (CA) has the highest concentration of people who consider home their primary place of work (4.2%) and Detroit-Warren-Livonia (MI) has the lowest (1.8%).
- ▶ The region with the fastest percentage growth in regular employee telecommuting was Riverside-San Bernardino-Ontario (CA)—posting a 77% increase since 2005 (based on growth relative to the local total population and among populations with over 1 million workers).
- ▶ Among the 124 metropolitan areas evaluated, 34% showed greater five-year growth in regular telecommuters than the national growth.
- ▶ The jury is still out on what impact the recession had on telecommuting. It appears that occasional telework decreased, and regular telework (at least weekly) increased, but we won't know until the 2010 Census data is available. Whatever the conclusion, the five year telework growth rate has been significant
- ▶ The biggest barrier to telecommuting, by a wide margin, is management fear and mistrust.

METHODOLOGY

Various federal agencies collect information about where people. The Census Bureau collects data on how people travel to work, with one option not traveling at all. The Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) captures information on where and when people work. BLS also polls companies about whether they offer flexible workplace options. The IRS and the SBA gather information about home-based businesses. And the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) tracks telework practices in the federal workforce.

In the private sector, a number of organizations track various forms of mobile work, including WorldatWork.

With all that tracking and gathering, you'd think it would be easy to create a picture of where and when people work. Unfortunately, it's not. The following is a summary of the various sources of data used in compiling this paper, along with an explanation of the limitations of each.

PUBLIC SECTOR DATA

Census / American Community Survey (ACS)

ACS is a nationwide survey conducted annually by the U.S. Census Bureau. It produces one-year estimates for geographic areas with a population of 65,000 or more: the nation, all states, the District of Columbia, all congressional districts, approximately 800 counties, and 500 metropolitan and micropolitan statistical areas. About three million housing unit addresses and 307 million people are represented in the weighted sample.

ACS asks survey respondents: “What was your primary means of transportation to work during the survey week?”

- ▶ Car, truck, or van - driving alone
- ▶ Car, truck, or van - carpooled
- ▶ Public transportation
- ▶ Walked
- ▶ Taxi, motorcycle, or bike
- ▶ Worked at home

ACS — Limitations

While the question offers some insight into the WAH workforce, it falls short of providing useful answers in a number of ways:

1) While the respondent is also asked whether they work for a private or public sector organization, if they’re self-employed, or if they’re an unpaid family worker, that ‘class of worker’ data is only tied to the ‘means of transportation to work’ category in a handful of Census Bureau reports.

For example, American Fact Finder, the primary search tool for Census data, does not allow users to determine the number of non-self-employed people in the construction industry who work from home in Millville, New Jersey. It could be used to determine in general how many were self-employed, were unpaid family workers, or were state government workers. It could also determine how many people in Millville just worked from home, but it would not allow you to break out the self-employed.

2) ACS only captures information about people who primarily work at home, not those who do so on an occasional basis—a group far larger than those who do so most of the time.

3) ACS does not capture information about people who work remotely from client offices, shared office centers, coffee shops, their cars, or other ‘third places’.

The Census Bureau occasionally conducts research that addresses some of these limitations, but they have not done so since 2004.

Use of ACS Data in This Paper

Because of the limitation of available ACS standard tables and online query interface, most of the data in this report was compiled from our own special tabulations of the Census Public Use Microdata Samples (PUMS)—a statistically accurate representation of the population based on a 5% micro-sample.

Five-year trend data is based on PUMS one-year estimates from 2005 through 2009, the most recent year available.

Certain metropolitan areas that were redefined during the five-year period are excluded from the trend analysis. Among those with workforces larger than one million people; the Denver and Miami metropolitan areas were omitted for this reason.

The statistical validity of changes in the WAH population obviously diminishes with a decrease in population size. In general, the data regarding the total regional WAH population is statistically valid, but the data for areas within populations smaller than a million may not be. For this reason, we primarily focus on larger metro regions.

Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS)

Two Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) surveys—the American Time Use Survey (ATUS), and the National Compensation Survey (NCS)—offered some useful material for this paper. However, the annual BLS survey does not allow standard searches or produce reports that distinguish the self-employed from the non-self employed at the industry, occupation, or other granular levels. The most recent surveys that do separate the self-employed from the rest of the WAH population cover only 2003 through 2007.

Further, BLS respondents are asked to answer questions based on where they worked on a particular survey day, which may or may not be indicative of their regular workplace.

BLS American Time Use Survey (ATUS)

ATUS is conducted annually. It includes, among other things, information about where and when people work—at their workplace, at home, or at another location. The data is collected through telephone interviews.

ATUS — Limitations

ATUS defines the term 'working' as time employed people spend doing tasks required for a job. A person who reads work-related e-mail messages for 10 minutes on a Saturday is counted as working on that day, as is someone who worked a 12-hour shift.

ATUS does not distinguish between people who are paid to work from home and those who simply take work home.

BLS National Compensation Survey (NCS)

The National Compensation Survey is conducted annually. It collects information from companies about the compensation and benefits they offer.

One benefit choice is 'flexible workplace'. BLS defines this as: "Permits workers to work an agreed-upon portion of their work schedule at home or at some other approved location, such as a regional work center." They note, "...such arrangements are especially compatible with work requiring the use of computers linking the home or work center to the central office."

NCS — Limitations

NCS data only indicates who offers a benefit, not who uses it, how, or how often.

Their count does not include companies that offer workplace flexibility on an ad hoc or occasional basis.

Other Federal Data

Data about participation in telework programs within the federal workforce comes from the annual Status of Telework in the Federal Government—Report to Congress.

PRIVATE SECTOR DATA

WorldatWork

WorldatWork is a non-profit organization with 30,000+ members in 75 countries. Nearly all Fortune 1000 companies are WorldatWork members. Results from two of their reports are included in this paper: Telework 2011—A WorldatWork Special Report and the 2011 Survey on Workplace Flexibility.

Telework 2011—A WorldatWork Special Report

Together with The Dieringer Research Group, WorldatWork has conducted periodic surveys about ad hoc, occasional, and regular telework among its members since 2003.

Their Telework 2011—A WorldatWork Special Report (based on 2010 data) was released on June 23, 2010.<sup>1</sup>

Approximately 1,000 randomly selected U.S. adults were surveyed for the 2011 report. The data was weighted to match the current population.

Telework 2011— Limitations

Because respondents self-reported their business type, some self-employed respondents may be counted among employee telecommuters. This may be significant because according to ACS data, the self-employed population suffered significant declines during the recession, while the employee telecommuter population grew.

Due to the small sample size, the teleworker segment of their sample has a margin of error of ±10 percent.

Survey on Workplace Flexibility

The WorldatWork 2011 Survey on Workplace Flexibility<sup>2</sup> asked its 5,191 global members what types of flexible work arrangements they offered to some or all employees. Of this group, 537 responses were included in the results.

Survey on Workplace Flexibility — Limitations

Because WorldatWork’s membership is comprised of a disproportionate share of large employers, (91 percent have more than 100 employees), their data under-represents small employers.

WAH TRENDS

ACS data showed that while the growth rate varied from year to year, the employee WAH population grew 61% between 2005 to 2009 (see Chart 1).

Chart 1 - Cumulative Increase In WAH
Source: 2006 to 2009 ACS PUMS Data

WorldatWork’s Telework 2011 survey (conducted in 2010) showed that in the wake of a 74 percent increase in the WAH population between 2005 and 2008, there was a small decline between 2008 and 2010 (460,000, when adjusted for the decline in the overall labor market).

Since ACS reports those who consider home their primary place of work and WorldatWork counts those who work at home at least one day a month, we won’t know what impact the recession had on multiple-day-a-week teleworkers until the 2010 ACS data is available.

What is clear is that while the recession may have slowed the rate of growth of telework, the 5-year picture shows significant growth.

WAH BY CLASS OF WORKER

Across all types of workers, the WAH population grew disproportionately faster than the total workforce (Chart 2).

Table 1 – 2005 and 2009 WAH by Class of Worker as a Percent of Total Workforce by Class of Worker

Class of Worker	2005	2009

Federal Government	0.7%	3.2%
Total	1.5%	2.3%

Source: 2005 and 2009 American Community Survey

In 2005, WAH employees totaled 1.5% of the non-self-employed population. By 2009, an additional 1.1 million WAH employees boosted that to 2.3% (Table 1, opposite).

The federal government has the highest percentage of WAH employees within their own population (see Table 1) though they only account for 5.2% of all WAH employees (see Table 2, next page).

Table 2 – 2009 WAH Population by Class of Worker

Table 3 below shows that in 2005, employees of private for-profit companies accounted for over 80% of the regular WAH population. By 2009, largely due to greater adoption among federal workers, while their total numbers grew, the private for-profit sector share of WAH employees dropped to 76%.

Private For-Profit Employees

In 2009, 2.2 million employees of private for-profit companies worked from home the majority of the time. They account for 76% of all WAH employees, but lag behind other employer categories in terms of participation rates. And, in part because it's harder to achieve a percentage increase in a large number than it is in a small one, the for-profit employer population also showed the slowest 5-year growth (51.6% - see Chart 2 on page 9).

Private Non-Profit Employees

About 300,000 non-profit employees called home their primary place of work in 2009. They were 10.2% of the WAH population, and posted the largest growth among the various employer categories during the recession. This is perhaps because non-profit organizations suffered more than others did during the recession, losing both patrons and investment earnings, and they responded by turning to more efficient and effective WAH arrangements.

Local and State Government Employees

Local and state government employees together accounted for 8.6% of the WAH workforce. They represent the lowest rates of participation among the various classes of workers. Some states, including Georgia, Virginia, and Arizona, have passed legislation to increase WAH within their workforce, but the majority of states have not.

Federal Employees

The WAH standout, in terms of both growth and participation rates, was the federal workforce. In part for the same reason the largest group grew the slowest, the smallest group grew the fastest.

Federal employees who considered home their primary place of work totaled only 30,000 in 2005. By 2006, that number had grown by over 400%, though little progress has been made since that time (see Discussion Section for details). According to ACS data, 3.2% of federal employees called home their primary place of work in 2009. By the government's own count, while 61% of the 2 million federal workers were considered eligible for telework, only about 100,000, or 5.2% of them did.

Though the federal workforce participation rate is higher than the rate of all other classes of workers, it's surprisingly low considering that since 2000 a federal mandate has required that every U.S. government employee work from home to the maximum extent possible.

The original driving force for WAH among federal workers was the threat of a bird flu pandemic. Since then, Hurricane Katrina, 'Snowmageddon', Swine Flu, and other crises have bolstered the government's resolve to make telework a continuity of operations (COOP) necessity.

In the current administration, the push for more federal telework has moved beyond COOP. Referring to himself as the Teleworker in Chief in his early days in office, President Obama has lobbied for telework.

In December of 2010, the Telework Enhancement Act passed through both houses of Congress with bipartisan support. While no funding was provided in the bill, agencies have been charged to:

- Designate a senior manager to coordinate the agencies' telework program
- Determine eligibility of employees, notify them of their eligibility status, and enter into written agreements with them for those who wish to telework
- Develop and implement telework training programs for managers and employees

The Office of Personnel Management's Director, John Berry, couldn't have been clearer about his and the current administration's support for telework in the agency's annual report on the status of telework to Congress:<sup>3</sup>

" . . . I believe telework must be implemented with a focus on accountability. As the President said at his White House Forum on Workplace Flexibility last March, 'It's about attracting and retaining top talent in the federal workforce and empowering them to do their jobs, and judging their success by the results that they get—not by how many meetings they attend, or how much face-time they log...' Presenteeism, the practice of sitting at one's desk without working, can be just as problematic as absenteeism. I am an adamant supporter of telework because workers in an effective telework program can only be judged by their results. Those who can't perform and can't improve can't hide behind their desks. It is up to management to give our employees clear direction and support, and then trust them to deliver." —Message from the Director, 2010 Status of Telework in the Federal Government.

While progress has been slow, federal telework is beginning to take hold. In 2010, the Patent and Trademark Office reported that 55% of its workforce teleworks on a regular basis. At the National Mediation Board, 43% do so.<sup>4</sup>

While the Telework Enhancement Act has no real teeth in terms of sanctions for non-compliance, taken together with other Presidential directives that call for increased sustainability, better continuity of operations, transition to telework-compatible technologies, and reductions in real estate footprints, we expect to see some real strides in federal telework in the years ahead.

WAH AS A COMMUTER ALTERNATIVE

As a primary means of transportation, not traveling at all now accounts for 2.3% of the non-self-employed employee workforce (see Chart 3), and is growing at a far greater rate than all other modes.

Chart 3 - Means of Transportation

Source: 2009 ACS PUMS Data

In a quarter of the nation's largest 20 metropolitan areas, more people work at home than travel to work via public transportation, walking, taxi, motorcycle, or bike (Table 4).

Top WAH Metro Areas

At the national level, the WAH population grew almost 12 times faster than the general population. In some areas, such as Riverside, CA, and Tampa, FL, it grew even faster.

Table 5 shows the 10 metro areas with the fastest WAH growth relative to their total workforce, and the actual WAH growth within those areas.

Eleven of the nation's 15 largest metropolitan areas have a higher percentage of people working from home than the national average of 2.3%. The San Diego-Carlsbad-San Marcos area topped the list with 4.2% of the population working from home most of the time. Detroit and Houston tied for the bottom slot (Table 6, next page).

WHO WORKS AT HOME?

More than 70% of the WAH population holds management, professional, sales, and office jobs (compared to 61% of the total workforce; see Chart 4, opposite).

Chart 4 - By Occupation, % Total Employed Population Compared to % WAH Population
Source: 2009 ACS PUMS Data

While their numbers are fewer, WAH now has a significant presence across occupations and industries as well (see Charts 4 and 5) because most jobs, even manufacturing, now involve some knowledge work. Thanks to technology, many in non-traditional WAH occupations and industries can now work remotely.

Chart 5 - By Industry, % Total Employed Population Compared to % WAH Population
Source: 2009 ACS PUMS Data

AGE

ACS data suggests that those who WAH are older than the average worker. The greatest proportional difference is among those over 60 (see Chart 6).

This suggests that workplace flexibility is favored by Baby Boomers, perhaps as a way to slowly edge into retirement. It debunks the concept that WAH and workplace flexibility are only suited to younger, more tech-savvy employees. And it challenges the myth that flexibility is just for women with children.

Chart 6 - Telworkers by Age
Source: 2009 ACS PUMS Data

Whether the age skew is a result of who chooses to work flexibly or who's chosen to can't be determined from the data. Likely two factors are at play here. First, senior workers have had more time to earn the trust that's essential to telework. Second, they are less likely to be concerned that opting to work flexibly will impact their advancement, a concern that's frequently cited by younger workers.

INCOME

Over three-quarters of WAH employees earn over $65,000 a year, putting them in the 80th percentile relative to the total workforce. While some industries, such as the call center industry offer WAH to the minimum wage workers, most still treat it as a privilege (see Chart 7, next page).

Chart 7 - Income Distribution Comparison
Source: 2009 ACS PUMS Data

THE SELF-EMPLOYED

While not the primary focus of this paper, since most government reports (and therefore the media) lump the self-employed in with the rest of WAH population, it's important to understand the impact of their numbers.

A fifth of all self-employed people work from home. They represent half of those who consider home their primary place of work and are an important part of the economy and the WAH population. However, the industries they represent, their motivations, and their demographics are very different from those of the employee WAH population.

On a five-year basis, the WAH segment of the self-employed population grew only slightly (1.7%). When their numbers are combined with the non-self-employed WAH population, the combined growth totaled only 23%, compared to the 61% growth of WAH without the self-employed.

The recession was not as kind to WAH business owners as it was to the employee WAH population. Both the total self-employed population and the WAH portion lost ground in 2008 and 2009 (see Chart 9).

EDUCATION

Most employees who work at home have at least a college degree, and a significant percentage have a post graduate degree. Again, this reinforces the observation that WAH jobs are not equally available to all workers (see Chart 8).

Chart 9 - 2005-2009 Self Employed Population

Largely as a result of the increase in the employee WAH population, the self-employed share of the WAH population fell from over 60% to 50% during the past five years (see Chart 10).

WHO OFFERS WAH JOBS?

Data on who offers work at home comes from two sources, the Bureau of Labor Statistics National Compensation Survey and WorldatWork.

Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) conducts an annual National Compensation Survey that includes questions about the benefits offered by companies.<sup>1</sup> To be counted as a benefit, it must be permanent and widely available.<sup>6</sup> The BLS count does not include ad hoc, occasional, and informal WAH programs, which WorldatWork shows to be, by far, the most common approach.

BLS SUMMARY OF WHO OFFERS WAH

In 2010, only 5% of companies reported offering flexible workplace benefits (see Table 7, opposite). That number has changed only one percentage point since 2003 (the first year of the survey).

Table 7 — % of Workforce Offered Flexible Workplace Benefits

Category	2007	2010
Private Companies	5%	5%
Company Size

Less than 100 Employees	3%	4%
Occupation

White-Collar	5%	6%
Wage Percentile

Second 25 Percentile	n.a.	3%
Third 25 Percentile	n.a.	6%
Highest 25 Percentile	n.a.	12%

Source: 2010 BLS National Compensation Survey

Again, the reason for this startlingly low number likely lies in the BLS's strict guidelines for inclusion as a benefit.

Within the population of those who offer flexible workplaces, the BLS data shows (see Table 7):

- ▶ Larger companies offer flexible workplaces more than smaller ones do.
- ▶ Such arrangements are five times more common in non-union establishments, and three times more available to white-collar versus blue-collar workers.
- ▶ There is a linear relationship between the availability of flexible workplace options and wages through the third 25th percentile—the higher the wage, the more likely the availability. But the highest wage earners are twice as likely to have access to workplace flexibility than the those in the third percentile are, and 12 times more likely than those in the lowest wage group.

WORLDATEWORK SUMMARY OF WHO OFFERS WORK AT HOME

WorldatWork's 2011 Survey on Workplace Flexibility<sup>7</sup> offers insight into ad hoc, occasional, and informal WAH practices of its members. To answer the question about which types of flexible work arrangements members offered to some or all employees, WorldatWork found:

- ▶ 83% offered it on an ad hoc basis (to meet a repair person, care for a sick child, etc.)
- ▶ 58% offered it a least one day a month, but not full time
- ▶ 57% offered it at least one day a week, but not full time
- ▶ 37% offered it full time

WAH Availability by Exempt vs. Non-Exempt

When asked if they made WAH available to all employees, the majority did not. All forms of telework were significantly more available to exempt than non-exempt employees (see Chart 11)

- ▶ 48% offered it ad hoc
- ▶ 29% offered it at least once a month
- ▶ 28% offered it at least once a week
- ▶ 16% offered it full time

WAH Availability by Company Size

In terms of company size, those with 10,000 or more employees were significantly more likely to offer telework at least one day a month to some or all employees than smaller companies (72-73% versus 52-62%).

Chart 11 - Exempt vs. NonExempt
Source: WorldatWork 2011 Survey of Workplace Flexibility

Companies with less than 100 employees or those with 10,000 to 20,000 employees were nearly equal in their offering of telework once a week (63% and 64% respectively). The largest companies (those with over 20,000 employees) were the most likely to do so (77%).

For the most part, the larger the company, the more likely they are to offer full-time telework (offered by 56% of the largest companies and 25% of the smallest).

WAH Availability by Type of Organization

The extent to which WorldatWork's member companies offered telework to at least some employees varied by type of company, with non-profit organizations offering regular and full-time telework more than any other sector. Publicly held companies were the second most likely to offer it on a regular basis (see Chart 12).

Chart 12 - Telwork Offerings by Type of Organization
 Source: 2011 WorldatWork Survey of Workplace Flexibility

Chart 13 - Obstacles to Telework
 Source: 2009 WorldatWork Telework Trendlines

WAH Availability by Industry

Full-time telework was most prevalent in finance/insurance and healthcare/social assistance industries (60% and 55% respectively). It was least available in the manufacturing industry—though still significantly offered at 24%. This challenges the commonly held theory that only service sector jobs are compatible with full-time telework. You have to look at the work itself to understand if it is compatible with WAH.

Obstacles to Offering Work at Home

When asked to indicate the primary obstacles to telework (among those who did not offer it), management resistance was overwhelmingly cited as the most common holdback. Job incompatibility was second (see Chart 13).

This data is consistent with a wide body of research that shows that while interest in WAH (of any frequency) is very high among employees and more than half of jobs are conducive to it, management resistance remains the biggest obstacle to WAH.

HOW OFTEN DO THEY WORK AT HOME?

BLS data showed a 28% increase in the number of employees who reported working at home (either as part of their regular workday or working after hours) from 2005 to 2009.

The average number of hours worked at home has been stable at about 2.5 hours a day since 2008 (see Table 8).

Table 8—Employees Who Performed Work at Home

Employees in management, professional, and related occupations worked remotely more than twice as many hours as other workers did, for a total of about 6.5 hours a week in 2007.<sup>8</sup>

While ancient in terms of how far technology has come, a 2004 special BLS supplement to the Current Population Survey showed the average number of paid WAH hours among those who have a formal WAH agreement to be equivalent to 2.4 days a week (see Table 9).<sup>9</sup>

WorldatWork asked survey participants: “Thinking of your normal business hours, how frequently do you work only at home for an entire day?” In 2008, approximately 16 million answered with at least once a month. That number has increased by almost 62 percent since 2005 (see Table 10).

Table 10 5 Yr Growth of WAH at least once a month

2005	2010	5 Year Increase
9.9 million	16 Million	61.6%

Source: WorldatWork surveys 2005 to 2009

WorldatWork also found that teleworkers were doing so more frequently in 2010 than in 2008. Those who reported they teleworked almost every day grew from 40 to 45 percent. And those who did do at least once a week, increased from 32 percent to 39 percent. At the same time, teleworkers reporting they worked from home once a month declined from 28% to 16%.<sup>10</sup> This shift may indicate that occasional telework is proving itself effective and reducing fears to the point that more frequent participation is accepted. Alternatively, it might indicate that the fringe teleworkers went back to the office during the recession while the more frequent participants—those who’d proven the savings potential, expanded their telework days.

WHERE DO THEY WORK?

In 2007, BLS compiled a special tabulation about where people worked. It showed that about 7.5% of work was performed at home and 2.9% was performed in other places. Again, those in managerial, professional, and related occupations did more at home (12.8%) and other places (3.5%) than other employees in other occupations.<sup>11</sup>

The latest BLS data does not include other places of work, but it does show a decrease in work conducted at an office from 90% in 2007 (a number that had changed little since 2003) to 87% in 2009.<sup>12</sup>

The second most common work location was home. On days they worked, nearly one in five employed people spent at least some time working at home (again, this includes a mix of paid and unpaid work).

Only about 3% of all work hours were performed at other locations, such as a restaurant, someone else’s home, or outside.

WorldatWork found similar numbers. They asked participants: “Indicate whether you have ever conducted work-related activities at any of the following types of locations over the past month.” Home was, by far, the most cited non-traditional place of work (63%).<sup>13</sup> The second most frequently cited location was in the car (40%). Other favored ad hoc offices included automobiles, eateries, and hotels (see Chart 14).

WHO WANTS TO WORK AT HOME?

While the question was not repeated in 2011, WorldatWork’s 2009 Telework Trendlines showed that 50% of non-telecommuters rated the chance to WAH as four or five on a scale where five meant they were very interested in working from home. Only 21% said they would not be interested at all. Thirty-seven percent said they’d take a small pay cut in exchange for being able to work at home two days a week.<sup>14</sup>

There are also some groups of people for whom being able to telework is more critical. These include the disabled, those with eldercare responsibilities (a rapidly growing group), military families, and rural workers.

WHO COULD WORK AT HOME?

Insight into this question of who could work at home can be gleaned from a number of studies:

1) The WorldatWork 2011 Survey on Workplace Flexibility suggested that employers felt that between 41% and 47% of jobs were compatible with WAH.<sup>15</sup>

2) WorldatWork's 2009 Telework Trendlines shows that the 38% of those who did not telecommute felt they had job-related tasks that could be done at home. Respondents most commonly answered that they felt they could do up to 40% of their job at home, though almost a quarter felt they could do 80% or more remotely.<sup>16</sup>

3) In 2005, researchers Matthews and Williams (M&W) estimated the potential WAH population at 40% of the workforce (based on 2002 BLS totals).<sup>17</sup> They did so by determining which U.S. jobs were telework compatible, which they defined as:

- ▶ Having an information component
- ▶ Being individual vs. group work
- ▶ Having clear parameters for evaluation
- ▶ Not requiring personal contact with customers
- ▶ Not requiring physical work that could only be done on site

On this basis, they included professional specialty, technical support, administrative support, and half of sales jobs (assuming that half were non-retail). They excluded management positions altogether, assuming (incorrectly) that "managers would not be teleworking in the near future."

We repeated Matthews and Williams approach using 2010 Labor Force numbers with the following modifications:

- ▶ We included a small portion of the populations where there were already people working at home in occupational categories that were not included in M&W's estimate. For service and production/transportation occupations, we assumed 5% compatibility. For construction and maintenance, we assumed 10%.
- ▶ For the government workforce, we assumed 61% of jobs were compatible based on the Department of Labor's 2009 Report to Congress.<sup>18</sup>
- ▶ For management jobs, we assumed 50% compatibility.

The result of our analysis shows that about 63 million U.S. employees hold jobs that could be done at home at least part of the time (45% of the workforce).

Taken together with the conclusions about who wants to work at home, we arrive at a total of about 50 million people as a theoretical maximum for WAH (see Table 11 and Chart 16). That accounts for 36% of the total workforce or 40% of the non-self-employed workforce.

WAH 1-5 days/month	16.0 M	25%

PROJECTED GROWTH

Over the years, many experts have put forth their predictions for growth of telework.

In 2005, Gartner Dataquest predicted that by 2008 thirty-six million U.S. employees would telework at least once a month (27% of the worker population) and 13 million would work from home at least once a week (10% of the population).<sup>19</sup>

In 2009, Forrester Research reported, "more than 34 million U.S. adults telecommuted at least occasionally." They added:

"Fueled by broadband adoption, better collaboration tools, and growing management experience, the U.S. telecommuting ranks will swell to 63 million by 2016. Those 29 million new telecommuters lined up five abreast would stretch from New York to LA! Leading the surge are occasional telecommuters and regular telecommuters who work from home between one and four days a week. The impact of this expanding remote workforce is far-reaching: It will force firms to expand their digital footprints, harness new social software, crisply define their culture, and examine their real estate and energy policies.”<sup>20</sup>

In February of 2011, Fortune Magazine reported that 82% of companies that made its annual “100 Best Companies to Work For” list allow employees to telecommute or work at home at least 20% of the time.<sup>21</sup>

There is no doubt that remote work will continue to grow. And there’s no doubt that it will soon begin to grow more quickly as a result of a number of factors, including:

- ▶ Ever improving communications and collaboration technologies
- ▶ Increased high-speed broadband penetration
- ▶ The proliferation of web-based applications
- ▶ A return of labor and talent shortages that were of key concern prior to the recession
- ▶ The needs and wants of an increasingly tech-savvy labor force
- ▶ The desire for flexible work among retiring Baby Boomers
- ▶ Record-low levels of employee engagement
- ▶ Workforce burnout—a factor that was already a problem before the recession, but even more so now as a result of it
- ▶ The increasing pressure on working adults to care for aging parents
- ▶ Increasing sophistication about how to manage and work with distributed workers and groups of workers.
- ▶ The declining numbers of Baby Boom managers who are not comfortable with WAH workers as they head off into retirement.
- ▶ Continued pressures on companies for indirect costs of office space including real estate, design, management, and operations.
- ▶ Escalating fuel prices and continued unrest in the Middle East

- ▶ Increasing pressure on companies to reduce their carbon footprint, including the likelihood of financial sanctions
- ▶ Continued emphasis on cost containment and bottom line performance
- ▶ The growing recognition of flexibility as a corporate strategy, not just an HR tactic
- ▶ Continual reminders of WAH as a continuity of operations strategy
- ▶ Growing concerns about our underfunded and under-maintained transportation infrastructure
- ▶ Federal budget pressures and government mandates for the federal workforce including the Telework Act and others on sustainability, continuity of operations, technology replacement cycles, real estate management, cloud computing and others.

The question remains: how quickly will remote work grow?

Clearly, ad hoc and occasional WAH will lead the way. More than 16 million people already work remotely at least once a month. Based on the historical growth rate reported by WorldatWork (roughly 12% per year), without any acceleration, that number will reach the theoretical maximum of 50 million people by 2018.

If we similarly project the regular WAH population growth, account for projected changes in the labor force, and assume it continues to grow at its historical growth rate, the regular WAH population would total 4.9 million by 2016, a 69% increase over its current level—but still a very small portion of the workforce and well below the forecasts of others.

CONCLUSIONS

While we acknowledge the barriers to widespread telework, it’s an interesting exercise to project what it would mean if the 50 million potential telecommuters in the U.S. worked from home on a regular basis (half time). Based on our Telework Savings Calculator™, the collective company, community, and individual savings would total over $900 billion a year. The financial and non-financial benefits would include:

BUSINESSES WOULD:<sup>22</sup>

- ▶ Save over $13,000 per person
- ▶ Increase productivity by over $466 billion—6 million man-years
- ▶ Save $170 billion in real estate and related costs (assuming a 20% reduction)
- ▶ Save $28 billion in absenteeism (25% reduction) and turnover (10% reduction)
- ▶ Improve continuity of operations
- ▶ Avoid environmental sanctions, city access fees, etc.
- ▶ Reduce their energy costs and carbon footprint
- ▶ Improve work-life balance and better address the needs of families, parents, and senior caregivers
- ▶ Avoid the ‘brain drain’ effect of retiring Boomers by allowing them to work flexibly
- ▶ Be able to recruit and retain the best people

INDIVIDUALS WOULD:<sup>23</sup>

- ▶ Achieve a better work-life balance
- ▶ Recoup almost a week of free time per year—time they’d have otherwise spent commuting
- ▶ Save $2,000-$6,700/year, not including daycare and eldercare costs or reduced car insurance premiums
- ▶ Suffer fewer illnesses

THE NATION WOULD:<sup>24</sup>

- ▶ Save 281 million barrels of oil a year ($28 billion/year at $100/barrel)—the equivalent of 46% of our Persian Gulf imports
- ▶ Reduce greenhouse gases by 51 million tons/year—the equivalent of the entire New York state workforce off the roads

- ▶ Reduce road travel by 91 billion miles/year thereby reducing the strain on our crumbling transportation infrastructure
- ▶ Reduce road congestion and increase the productivity for non-telecommuters
- ▶ Save 77,000 people from traffic-related injury or death
- ▶ Improve emergency responsiveness
- ▶ Reduce pollution from road work and new office construction
- ▶ Reduce the offshoring of jobs and homeshore some that have already been lost
- ▶ Provide fuller employment opportunities for special populations include rural workers, the disabled, and military families
- ▶ Reduce the economic and political vulnerability that stems from our dependence on foreign oil
- ▶ Reduce terrorism targets of opportunity

More than a dozen state and federal legislative initiatives aimed at encouraging telework have been introduced in the past three years. Many have been enacted. Federal transportation monies already fund a handful of state and local advocacy programs. While this is encouraging, unless a coordinated approach to telework is taken, well-intended initiatives risk duplication of effort and cost. Moreover, without a good understanding of who is already teleworking, it will be impossible to measure the success or return on investment of new programs.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SHOULD:

- ▶ Develop cross-agency initiatives to foster state and local telework advocacy programs. DOE, EPA, DOT, DOL, SBA, VA, CDC, the Council on Disability, NSA, DOI, DOD, and even SSA all have something to gain from telework.
- ▶ Specifically include telework as a valid transportation demand management and pollution reduction strategy in the nation’s transportation and energy policies.
- ▶ Collect data from those state and local advocacy programs that have already proven successful. TeleworkVA, for example, has a program that offers cash incentives to companies that allow their people to work from home. Other successful models are offered by the federal government's own telework programs, The Telework Exchange, TelecommuteConnecticut, Commuter Challenge in Seattle, 36 Commuting Solutions in Denver, M-ATAC in Washington DC, TelCoa, WORKShiftCalgary, the Sloan Work and Family Network, and dozens of private practitioners. Sharing information about what has already been tried and what has worked can save substantial expense.

- ▶ Agree on a universally accepted method of verifying and measuring telework participation. This is particularly important as public monies are used to fund programs and as city access fees, commuter taxes, carbon reporting, and environmental sanctions become realities.
- ▶ Provide funding for the implementation of the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010. Passed with bipartisan support, this legislation is intended to increase telework participation within federal agencies, but as no funding was associated with the bill, many agencies are finding it impossible to comply.
- ▶ Establish a public-private partnership within SBA to help small private sector companies evaluate and implement telework.
- ▶ Encourage states and local governments to support telework for their own employees and to encourage private sector adoption. Progress toward telework goals should be included in agency head and managers performance evaluations. Best practices and vendor assessments should be openly shared between government agencies to avoid duplication of effort and ensure that poor performing vendors are not hired elsewhere (think Yelp for government). Essential telework fundamentals such as IT and organizational readiness assessments and telework training (for agency leaders, managers, employees). should be required for all programs using federal funds to ensure that programs are not set up for failure. Pre- and post-telework metrics should be captured to accurately evaluate program success.
- ▶ Include questions in future American Community Surveys that allow researchers to easily distinguish home-based employees, home-businesses, volunteers, and unpaid family workers across all variables. In addition, questions should be added to account for mobile employees and to determine where and how often each class of worker is working remotely.

- ▶ Make ubiquitous high-speed broadband access a priority. Without uniform access, telework will not be available to those who need it the most.
- ▶ Require that state and local taxing authorities abolish policies that double-tax home-based workers. New York's 'telecommuter tax' may explain why the NY metro region's telework participation rate is so low.
- ▶ Offer partial home office tax credits for people who work from home part time and allow WAH employees to deduct their home office equipment costs.
- ▶ Offer Small Business Innovation Grants (SBIR) to inspire technology that supports telework.
- ▶ Encourage the relaxation of local zoning laws that prohibit home-based work.
- ▶ Evaluate OSHA, Fair Labor Standards, ERISA, and other employer regulations that impact remote work.

DISCUSSION

WHY DO SOME METRO AREAS HAVE HIGHER CONCENTRATIONS OF TELEWORKERS THAN OTHERS?

We expected to find a positive correlation between areas with the worst congestion or those with the highest levels of 'extreme commutes' and high levels of telework, but didn't find such a relationship. We expected to find a correlation in places where there are telework incentives, but we didn't.

What we see most in the data are places with large populations of information workers—Detroit is at the bottom of the list for example. But there are many factors that might encourage or discourage telework. For example, a long period of highway maintenance in San Diego, coupled with a relatively limited public transportation system may have led to its work at home growth. And while New York is infamous for its traffic jams, its "telecommuter tax" (essentially double taxation of telecommuters) most likely discourages participation.

The fastest growth areas may be a result of slow starters, an example of the "brilliant recovery from a piss poor start" effect. It's easier to achieve a large percentage increase in a small space than it is a large one.

WHAT CAUSED THE SURGE IN FEDERAL WORKERS TELECOMMUTING? IT'S OBVIOUSLY TOO EARLY FOR IT TO BE THE TELEWORK ENHANCEMENT ACT.

The huge growth (+400%) all came between 2005 and 2006. Until recently, continuity of operations was the primary driver of Federal telework. In 2005 both the Oklahoma City bombing and Hurricane Katrina were wake-up calls. In addition, in part because of Katrina—but also as a result of increased demand, fuel prices had been steadily rising. They crossed the $3/gallon barrier in late 2005, and some people said, "Enough!" Oddly, the $4/gallon barrier does not seem to have the same impact.

Here's the federal government's own take on the 2006 growth in telework among federal workers:<sup>25</sup>

"In the wake of the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina, we have seen the importance of telework in responding flexibly to emergency situations— in this case, by providing a tool to help alleviate the issues caused by steeply rising fuel prices nationwide. Additionally, Congress showed its continuing interest in telework in the Federal Government through the enactment of Public Law 108-447 in December of 2004, encouraging increased telework participation in certain agencies."

WHY IS YOUR FORECAST FOR THE GROWTH OF TELEWORK SO MUCH MORE CONSERVATIVE THAN THOSE OF OTHERS

Having worked with a number of companies and government agencies in the early stages of their telework programs, it's clear that the majority is not ready to make the organizational culture shift that's required to manage a remote workforce. The issue of mistrust—'how do I know they're working', is huge and not easily overcome. Management attitudes that were born in the days of sweatshops and typing pools still dominate. And even in those rare organizations where senior management unambiguously supports the concept, lack of middle management buy-in is the stumbling block.

Oddly, the fact that the majority of information industry employees are not at their desk most of the time, is something most companies don't want to acknowledge. The tools, training, and technologies that are needed to support telework, are really just a catch-up on how employees are working already.

While looming labor shortages, increased pressure from value chain partners and others to engage in sustainable practices, rising fuel prices, budget pressures and a variety of other factors will continue to make telework attractive, the cultural barriers will not be quickly overcome.

"This benefit is also known as flexiplace or telecommuting. It allows employees who traditionally work at the establishment to regularly work an agreed-upon portion of their work schedule at home or other approved location. Excludes temporary arrangements.

1) An employee with a chronic back problem for years expects no improvement. Arrangements are made for him to work at home 2 days a week indefinitely. If this arrangement is personalized for a specific individual, and other employees would not expect the same treatment under similar circumstances, the plan would be out of scope.

2) An employee's work involves review of documents on the computer and email with clients to resolve issues. Work can be done away from the office as long as the employee has computer access. The employee has production quotas to meet each day. The company allows the employee to work from home one day per week as long as the quotas are maintained. This is an in-scope arrangement because other than failing to maintain a quota, there is no indication that the arrangement is temporary.

3) Another employee breaks a leg and cannot drive for 3 months. His company allows him to telecommute from home during the recuperation, with the understanding that the telecommunicating would end after 3 months. This is an out-of-scope flexible workplace arrangement because of the specified three month limitation.

Note: Arrangements that are expected to continue indefinitely are usually in scope; those set up for a special project are out of scope."

INTRODUCTION

State and local government employees are bummed out, burned out, and stressed out from the endless struggle of trying to do more with less. To make matters worse, more than half the state's most experienced people are moving toward the door to retirement. If California expects to attract a new generation of talented government leaders and staff workers it needs to find a new way of working, both figuratively and literally.

This report will show how telework can save government employers up to $11,000 per part-time telecommuter per year. This new workplace strategy offers a relatively easy, inexpensive, and popular solution to some of government's most vexing problems such as:

- attracting and retaining talent
- reducing traffic congestion
- improving air quality
- reducing energy consumption
- reducing employee stress
- increasing morale

Thanks to advances in technology work no longer needs to be tethered to time or place. Telework allows substitution of technology for business travel in general, and telecommuting substitutes technology for commuter travel specifically. Thanks to these new ways of working, employers are slowly learning that when employees are not constrained by where and when work is done, they're more productive, more creative, and more successful.

In the 1970s Jack Nilles, a former NASA rocket scientist, turned his attention to solving the problem of traffic congestion and coined the terms telework and telecommuting. At the time, many predicted we'd soon see an end to the wasteful and inefficient exercise of moving millions of workers back and forth to work each day.

Those predictions, and many since, have failed to materialize. While research shows that about 50 percent of state and local government jobs are telework-compatible, only 5.3 percent of state workers and 2.5 percent of local workers consider home their primary place of work.<sup>1,2</sup>

Thousands of organizations and millions of employees in a wide range of public and private sector jobs have already successfully adopted a wherever, whenever approach to work. They're proof that the biggest barrier to telecommuting—management mistrust—can and should be overcome because the bottom-line benefits are worth the effort. And those same organizations have perfected and made available “best practices” that use a combination of technological and cultural solutions to address the security, communications, collaboration, managerial, and social aspects of remote work.

Those leaders have shown that by offering workplace flexibility and measuring performance based on results rather than presence, they really can do more with less: less buildings, less pollution, less overtime, and less waste. And their employees can do more with less too—less stress, less distractions, and less driving.

While worries over weather calamities, earthquakes, the spread of disease, terrorism, rising fuel prices, transit strikes, and road closures often spike an interest in remote work, less transient issues are now driving more widespread adoption.

Talent shortages, changing workforce dynamics, and employee burnout—key drivers of workplace flexibility before the recession—are returning with a vengeance. Research by Gallup shows that 70 percent of the workforce is not engaged. As much as 20 percent are either wandering around in a fog, or actively undermining their co-workers' success.

The majority of Baby Boomers are at or near the highest rung of the career ladder they're likely to achieve. The raises, promotions, and accolades that once motivated them have been replaced with thoughts of retirement, aging parents, mortality, and “what do I really want out of life?” AARP research shows that 70 percent want to continue to work, but they want to do it on their terms. Even now, many are eyeing self-employment as an option.

Gen X, the first latchkey kids, watched their workaholic parents climb the career ladder. They’re independent souls because they had to be. They learned the reality of employer loyalty from seeing their parents struggle through the layoffs of the early ‘80s—a lesson that’s been reinforced in recent years. They grew up with technology and they value freedom; and they want to do things their way.

Gen Y grew up questioning their parents; now they’re questioning their employers. They’re confident, tech-savvy, happy to communicate virtually and eager to be part of a team, but they’re not in it for the gold watch.

The message is clear. This is not your father’s workforce.

Telework isn’t ‘just’ an HR, IT, corporate real estate, or sustainability tactic. It’s much more. Best practices show that in order to maximize its potential, workplace flexibility needs to be part of an organization’s culture. It needs to be endorsed at the highest levels, supported by middle management, coordinated across functional areas, and integrated into everyone’s goals.

Winning employers have already taken steps to make work flexible; to manage their salaried, hourly and contingent workforce by what they do, not where, when or how they do it; and they’ve adopted the tools and technologies that make flexible work possible.

California is home to some of the worst traffic, natural disaster, sustainability, and budget challenges in the country. Telework offers a solution.

ABOUT THIS REPORT

While there are benefits associated with all forms of workplace flexibility, the focus of this paper is on regular home-based telecommuting. There are three reasons for this. First, home-based telecommuting is the only form about which government data is available. Second, while working in coffee shops, at telework centers, or other places is popular, home is by far the most common non-traditional workplace. And third, regular part-time telework offers the greatest benefits for all constituents and few of the drawbacks.

This paper is organized into three sections that summarize the qualitative and quantitative benefits of telecommuting for:

- Government agencies
- Employees, and
- the Community at large

The quantitative conclusions in this paper are based on a Telework Savings Calculator™ built by the Telework Research Network, a consulting and research organization that specializes in evaluating the bottom-line impact of workplace flexibility for companies and communities.

Using the latest government data and assumptions culled from a synthesis of over 500 case studies, scholarly reviews, research papers, books, and other documents on telecommuting and related topics, the Telework Research Network has analyzed the economic, environmental, and societal potential of telecommuting for the US, the UK, and Canada. Their unique research has been cited in the Wall Street Journal, Harvard Business Review, Inc. magazine, and scores of other publications.

Throughout this report, every attempt has been made to err on the side of cautious assumptions, rather than aggressive ones. Data was collected from the most respected sources and industry experts. Where possible, multiple sources were consulted to corroborate the assumptions.

The primary sources of data used in the development of the California Public Workforce Telework Savings Calculator™ include:

- American Community Survey / Census
- Bureau of Labor Statistics
- California Air Resources Board
- Booz Allen / GSA Telework Study
- US Bureau of Transportation Statistics
- US Environmental Protection Agency
- National Highway Safety Administration
- WorldatWork
- Reason Foundation
- California Telework Advisory Group

Telework Savings Calculator: General Assumptions

The following general assumptions provide the basis for the analysis that follows:

- ▶ Telecommuting frequency: average of 2 days per week <sup>3</sup>
- ▶ Employees who want to telecommute: 79 percent <sup>4</sup>
- ▶ Jobs compatible with telework: 51 percent of state government employees, 48 percent of local government employees <sup>5</sup>

EMPLOYER BENEFITS

The primary financial benefits of telework for employers come from reduced real estate costs, increased productivity, and reduced absenteeism and turnover.

REAL ESTATE IMPACT

Traditional offices are expensive, inefficient, inflexible, and difficult to scale (particularly down). Telework programs can not only reduce the capital drain of owning or leasing a building, they can save on electricity, transit subsidies, parking lot leases, furniture, supplies, maintenance, security, janitorial, insurance, taxes, common area expenses, and other related costs.

In addition, telework can reduce the cost of complying with disability, environmental, and office safety regulations. And it can help agencies consolidate inefficient space.

Through desk sharing, office hoteling, and other changes to the office footprint, organizations have found they're able to save money and, at the same time, better address the needs of their workforce.

When asked to assess the lasting impacts of the recession, over sixty percent of respondents to a New Ways of Working (NewWOW.net) survey reported replacing assigned one-to-one workplace seats with alternative workspaces.

Videoconferencing, teleconferencing, remote desktop technologies, virtual training, and other remote collaboration technologies are changing the nature of work. The most progressive organizations are designing their workplaces to increase efficiency, and promote teamwork. For them, the traditional office is where people go to collaborate, and employees' home offices are where people go to concentrate and get things done.

“Walking around the offices at Sun Microsystems and seeing 70% of the desks and offices empty is what sold me on telework.”

- Scott McNealy, former CEO, Sun Microsystems

Industry Research on Real Estate Savings

- The US Patent & Trademark Office avoided $11 million in new real estate expenses through telework and office hoteling. Over 80 percent of eligible staff telework telecommute.
- The Defense Contract Management Agency, plans to shed all but 1,000 of its almost 13,000 desktop computers over the next three years, for an estimated savings of $5 million by 2014.
- Sun Microsystems reported saving $68 million a year in real estate costs, $3 million a year in reduced power consumption, and $25 million a year in IT expenditures with flexible work options for 17,000 employees.
- McKesson Corporation’s telework program saves $1 million a year in real estate costs.
- At Oracle BV, redesigned workspaces, hot-desking, and electronic access to documents improved interaction between staff and reduced space usage from 247 sq. ft. per employee to 140 sq. ft..
- Microsoft was able to accommodate 30 percent more people in the same amount of space through flexible workplace strategies.
- Hewlett Packard, through a combination of mobile work initiatives and space reconfiguration, has been able to drive office space utilization from 35 percent—not atypical in modern offices—to over 75 percent in just 3 years. They’re desk-sharing ratios range from between 2 to 1 and 20 to 1.
- DEGW, a worldwide workplace strategy consulting firm, reports that based on a survey of over 60,000 North American employees and their observations of thousands of workers, the average knowledge worker spends only about 35 percent of the time at their desk.

Telework Savings Calculator: Real Estate Assumptions

- ▶ Real estate reduction: 20 percent for two-day-a-week telework based on U.S. GSA model
- ▶ Electricity savings: none assumed (extra home office energy usage is, however, shown as an offset to Employee Savings covered later in this paper)

The Bottom Line on Real Estate:

$1,360 in annual savings per 2 day a week teleworker

Government-wide savings: $563 million a year

PRODUCTIVITY IMPACT

Lack of management buy-in is the most commonly cited obstacle to the adoption of telecommuting programs. It’s clear that the majority of managers feel that left unmonitored, employees will not work as hard as they otherwise would. The facts show just the opposite to be true.

Study after study reveals that people who work from home are more productive than their office counterparts. Contributing factors include:

- Fewer interruptions: Home-based workers are not distracted by the many time drains that take place in a traditional office: morning chatter, coffee breaks, long lunches, rumor mills, birthday parties, football pools, etc.
- More effective time management: E-mail and other asynchronous communications can be time-managed more effectively and are less apt to include non-work digressions.

- Feeling like a trusted employee: A sense of empowerment and commitment has consistently shown to be one of the highest contributors to employee job satisfaction.
- Flexible hours: For those who are able to flex their hours as well as their location, telecommuting allows them to work when they are most productive.
- Longer hours: Many employees work during the time they would have otherwise spent commuting. In fact, overworking is a significant problem.

Industry Research on Productivity

- A study of the return on investment from telework prepared by management consulting firm Booz Allen for the US General Services Administration estimated increased productivity among teleworkers at one hour per day.
- In a 2008 global survey of nearly 2,000 employees, Cisco Systems estimated they could achieve an annual increase in productivity of $277 million through telework. They found:
  - their teleworkers spend 60 percent of time they would have otherwise spent commuting doing work
  - 69 percent of employees cited higher productivity when working remotely
  - 75 percent of telecommuters felt their ability to meet deadlines improved
  - 83 percent said their ability to collaborate and communicate with co-workers was the same as or better than being on-site
- A Basex survey of over 1,000 information workers concluded that workplace interruptions comprise 25 percent of their workday.
- A 2010 survey by TELUS Communications found that 56 percent of respondents thought the option to work flexibly would motivate them to work harder.
- Alpine Access, one of the largest all-virtual employers, attributes a 30 percent increase in sales and 90 percent reduction in customer complaints to its home-based agents.

- Sun Microsystems (now part of Oracle), found that teleworkers spend 60 percent of the commuting time they saved performing work for the company.
- In an IBM study of more than 24,000 global managers, 80 percent agreed that productivity increases in a flexible environment.
- A Work+Life Fit / BDO Seidman survey of CFOs showed that 75 percent felt that flexible work increases productivity.
- Best Buy measured an average productivity increase of 35 percent through its flexible work program.

Telework Savings Calculator: Productivity Assumptions

- ▶ Productivity increase: 15 percent on telework days based Booz Allen / U.S. GSA report
- ▶ Average salary: $76,862 for state government employees, $77,442 for local government employees based on American Community Survey data for telework-compatible jobs
- ▶ Employee benefits overhead: 34.5 percent based on BLS Data

The Bottom Line on Productivity:

$6,200 annual increase per 2 day a week teleworker

Government-wide savings: $2.6 billion a year

ABSENTEEISM IMPACT

Unscheduled absences cost employers billions. They necessitate staffing redundancies, increase overtime costs, inconvenience coworkers and customers, impact morale, and reduce productivity.

Telecommuters are absent less often because they:

- Are less exposed to sick co-workers
- Are exposed to fewer occupational and environmental hazards
- Avoid driving—something OSHA considers to be the most dangerous part of an employee's day
- Continue to work when they're sick
- Return to work more quickly following pregnancy, surgery, or extended illnesses
- Are able to handle personal appointments without taking a full day off
- Have more time for exercise
- Eat better

Perhaps the most important reason they're absent less is that they are more satisfied with their job and therefore less likely to fabricate an illness.

According to the Conference Board of Canada, a global independent not-for-profit organization focused on helping businesses strengthen their performance and better serve society, absenteeism is at the highest level it's been in the 20 years they've been tracking it. Recession-related stress is likely the blame.

According to Towers Watson, a leading global professional services company, the link between healthy and productivity goes beyond the physical and mental health of individuals to creating a healthy work environment. They find that organizations with the most effective health and productivity programs experience:

- 11 percent higher revenue per employee

- Lower medical trends by 1.2 percentage points
- 28 percent higher shareholder returns

Towers Watson also found that excessive work hours (75 percent), lack of work/life balance (65 percent), and fears about job loss (64 percent) are the foremost sources of stress affecting organizations today.

The opposite of absenteeism, presenteeism is costly for organizations too. The people who drag themselves to the office only to make everyone else sick aren't doing anyone any favors. Studies show that the large majority of people go to work when they're sick because the company culture, benefits, or policies—perhaps unwittingly—encourage it.

Industry Research on Absenteeism

- Sick leave among state and local government employees is almost 70 percent higher than that of the private sector
- 78 percent of employees who call in sick, really aren't. They do so because of family issues, personal needs, and stress
- The US federal government's telework cost/benefit model estimates a 63 percent reduction in unscheduled absences per teleworker
- The federal government's telework program was originally put in place to avoid the spread of contagious disease
- Telework has proven to be the second most effective method of reducing absences; flexible scheduling is first
- Among those companies that have tried to reduce work-life conflict, 84 percent say it's had a positive impact
- A Wake Forest University study of over 3,000 employees showed that those with flexible schedules were less likely to have health problems that affect their job performance
- Companies with the most effective health and productivity programs have 1.8 fewer days absent per employee

"Until cable companies starts giving precise appointments (not 9am to 1pm), we will always have people sitting at home waiting on them. The choice is ours, we can have them productive on work or watching TV."

- John Sawislak, Senior Fellow at the Telework Exchange

Telework Savings Calculator: Absenteeism Assumptions

- ▶ Current absenteeism rate: 2.5 percent based on BLS data
- ▶ Annual cost per unscheduled absence per person: based on average daily compensation for local and state government telework-compatible jobs (American Community Survey)
- ▶ Average reduction in absenteeism: 4 days a year based on Booz Allen / GSA model

The Bottom Line on Absenteeism:

$1,790 per telecommuter per year

Government-wide savings: $740.7 million a year

ATTRACTION AND RETENTION IMPACT

The majority of state employees who hold managerial or higher positions will be eligible to retire in the next five years. Among them:

- 62 percent of Career Executives / Exempts
- 50 percent of Managers / Supervisors
- 35 percent of Rank and File

Retaining senior government talent is crucial to the knowledge transfer process.

The cost of replacing an employee extends far beyond the recruiting process; it includes separation costs, temporary replacement costs, training costs, and lost productivity. An employee's exit can also lead to a loss of business, coworkers, and organizational memory. Telecommuting enhances attraction and retention because it:

- Is among the top non-financial benefits desired by employees
- Expands the talent pool beyond geographic boundaries
- Provides access to disabled, rural, and other difficult to reach workers
- Offers alternatives that would have otherwise kept retirees, parents and senior caregivers out of the full-time workforce

Prior to the recession, being able to hire and retain good people was one of management's top non-financial concerns. As the recovery continues, retention and hiring problems will be exacerbated.

In a 2007 report, Deloitte predicted that the government sector would be particularly hard hit by talent shortages in the years ahead. "To become a choice employer among this emerging workforce, the public sector must appeal to a population insistent upon a sociable, flexible, purposeful, and technologically savvy work environment. Certain perceptions of government work, if not reversed, pose a major obstacle to attracting Gen Y into government. The image of the public sector as a slow-moving, bureaucratic monolith, juxtaposed against a fast-moving, anti-bureaucratic Gen Y, poses a significant challenge."

"In a bad economy, we can hire and retain good employees with little effort, but as the economy improves (and it always does), the first sign will be when we lose our good people. Flexible work rules allow us to keep our best people happy even as the competition for their services increases."

- John Sawislak, Senior Fellow at the Telework Exchange

Industry Research on Attraction and Retention

- Research by WorldatWork shows that 79 percent of employees say they would like to work from home, at least part of the time.
- In a 2011 survey of over 2,000 adults conducted by Mom Corps, more than 40 percent said they would take a pay cut in exchange for the opportunity to work from home.
- A study conducted by Deloitte at the peak of the recession found that nearly half of employees were either looking for a new job or planning to do so when the economy improved.
- In a Cisco survey of 2,600 worldwide employees, two out of three said they would take a job with less pay and more flexibility over a higher-paying job without it. Ninety-one percent of respondents said telecommuting was somewhat or very important to their overall job satisfaction.
- A WorldatWork survey found that 85 percent of employers say telework has a moderate to high impact on employee retention.
- Turnover among VIPDesk's home-based customer agents is less than 10 percent; compared to 100–150 percent typical in a traditionally staffed call center.
- Over two-thirds of Schering-Plough Corporation's telework program participants say that being able to telework has been a factor in their decision to stay with the company.
- In a Robert Half / Career Builder survey, 72 percent of employees said flexible work arrangements would cause them to choose one job over another; 37 percent specifically cited teleworking.
- That same Robert Half / Career Builder survey found over half of managers felt that Gen Y workers are more difficult to recruit and to retain but noted that they are particularly attracted to flexible work arrangements (ranked as 8 on a 10 scale for impact on overall job satisfaction).
- An AARP study found that 70 percent of Baby Boomers plan to work for pay after retirement by seeking flexible work arrangements and part-time schedules that allow them to pursue other interests.

- A Cornell University reported that 71 percent of retired workers who later decided to go back to work originally retired because of a desire for more flexibility than their job offered.
- BLS data shows that 5.4 million Americans with at least some college education aren't working.
- More than 12 percent of the working age population is disabled. Accessible-Society.org reports that a full three quarters of those who are unemployed cite discrimination in the workplace and lack of transportation as the major factors that prevent them from working.
- In a nationwide survey, CDW found that forty-one percent of workers who have the option to telework are "very satisfied" with their jobs, compared to only 27 percent of those who are office-bound.
- WorldatWork and other workforce experts estimate that turnover costs and employer 75 percent of an hourly person's pay, and between 150 – 200 percent of an salaried person's pay.

Telework Savings Calculator: Retention Assumptions

- ▶ Reduction in attrition: 15 percent based on a synthesis of a wide range of studies
- ▶ Existing voluntary turnover: 9.2 percent based on BLS data for state and local government jobs
- ▶ Cost of turnover: 138 percent of salary based on mid-point of WorldatWork estimates

The Bottom Line on Retention:

$1,980 annual savings per 2 day a week teleworker

Government-wide savings: $819 million a year

OTHER EMPLOYER BENEFITS

Employer benefits that have not been quantified in this report include:

- Improved continuity of operations
- Reduced transit subsidies
- Avoidance of environmental sanctions
- Higher community citizenship scores for being environmentally and labor friendly
- Reduced overtime
- Improved customer service
- Reduced paper, travel, and technology costs
- Reduced ADA compliance costs
- Reduced need for overstaffing to accommodate peak loads
- More effective and less expensive 24/7 global coverage
- Avoidance of local labor burnout
- Ability to hire people without brick and mortar presence
- Reduced healthcare costs
- Reduced vehicle fleet

EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Employers aren't the only ones who benefit from telework. For employees, it saves them two of their most precious commodities, time and money.

A CDW study found the top reasons federal employees want to work from home are:

- Reduced commute (63 percent)
- Greater flexibility (49 percent)
- Greater productivity (29 percent)
- Saving money (28 percent)

EMPLOYEE FINANCIAL SAVINGS

In a Business Week survey conducted during the 2008 run up in fuel prices, 92 percent of employees said they were concerned with the high cost of fuel. Eighty percent of them specifically cited the cost of commuting to work. Seventy-three percent felt their employers should take the lead in helping them reduce their commuting costs. In the same survey, two-thirds said they'd take another job to ease the commute. At the time, fuel was more than a dollar a gallon cheaper than it is today.

Beyond the cost of gas, telecommuters save on vehicle wear and tear, parking, transit costs, food, clothing, and more.

Telework Savings Calculator: Employee Cost Savings Assumptions

- ▶ Gas cost: $3.80 per gallon
- ▶ Gas usage based on EPA standards
- ▶ Parking costs: based on Colliers Parking Survey (high, mid, low)
- ▶ Food (net of food at home): based on BLS data (high, mid, low)
- ▶ Clothing: based on BLS data (high, mid, low)

- ▶ Distance to work: 32 miles round-trip based on Air Quality Management District data
- ▶ Workweeks per year: 46.6 based on California Telework Advisory Group data
- ▶ Auto costs (net of gas): based on IRS data
- ▶ Reduction in driving on telework days: 75% per Air Quality Management District data
- ▶ Breakdown of means of transportation to work (solo drivers, car/vanpoolers, public transit users, bikers, walkers, other): American Community Survey, California government worker data
- ▶ Cost of extra home office electricity (as a reduction in employee savings): based on data from the Global Environment and Technology Foundation

Employee Time Savings

In terms of time, twice weekly telework can save between 1 and 3 workweeks a year—time they'd have otherwise spent commuting.

And the commute is likely to get worse. According to the Reason Foundation, if traffic continues to grow at the current pace over the next couple of decades, drivers in many of the nation's cities will be sitting in daily traffic jams worse than those that currently plague Los Angeles 8 hours a day. Their commutes will take almost twice as long.

Telework Savings Calculator: Employee Time Savings Assumptions

- ▶ Mean round-trip commute: 54 minutes based on American Community Survey data for California
- ▶ Equivalent days calculation based on 8-hour days

OTHER EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Beyond the employee savings we've quantified in this paper, many employees can save on:

- Daycare/eldercare—particularly for those who are able to adjust their hours around those needs
- Serendipity purchases
- Office gifts and kitties
- Vehicle insurance
- Healthcare costs
- Other office-related incidentals

In addition, some may qualify for home office deductions. And some may even be able to relocate to less expensive communities or avoid selling their real estate at distressed values in order to take a job in a new community.

The Bottom Line on Employee Savings:

$1,850 to $4,500 in annual savings per 2 day a week teleworker per year

8 workdays a year in time they'd have otherwise spent commuting

Workforce-wide savings: $1.1 billion (based on mid-level savings)

COMMUNITY BENEFITS

In his book, A Thousand Barrels a Second: The Coming Oil Break Point and the Challenges Facing an Energy Dependent World (McGraw-Hill 2007), Peter Tertzakian, Chief Energy Economist & Managing Director at ARC Financial Corporation writes: “Right now, the only thing anyone cares about is the rising price of energy; but soon we’ll be worried about potential changes to our lifestyles, the trade-off between cheap energy and clean energy, the necessity of building new refineries and power plants in our backyards, an even the impact on nation security. Our birthright of abundant, reliable energy is coming to an end.”

“Expanding performance-based telework will save taxpayer money, ease traffic congestion, save energy, and help us clean our air,” says Auburn City Council member, Kevin Hanley. “Implementing a smart telework policy is indispensable in getting California on the comeback trail.”

Telecommuting can reduce our energy usage, greenhouse gases, and traffic congestion and provide a significant savings to society.

Telework Savings Calculator: Energy, Greenhouse Gas (GHG), and Air Quality Improvement Assumptions

- ▶ Gas savings: as described in the Employee Benefits section
- ▶ Trip reduction: based on Air Quality Management District data applied to breakdown of CA government employee means of transportation to work (per American Community Survey)
- ▶ Imported oil cost = $100/barrel
- ▶ GHG calculations based on EPA standards
- ▶ Air Quality improvements based on California Air Quality Board standards applied to breakdown of CA government employee means of transportation to work (per American Community Survey)
- ▶ Note: U.S. GHG reduction stated in million metric tons (MMT)

TRAFFIC & ACCIDENT IMPACT

According to TrafficSafety.org, traffic accidents cost the nation $60 billion a year and result in 3 million lost workdays. More than a quarter of accidents occur during the commute to and from work, making it the most dangerous part of an employee’s day.

Traffic congestion stresses drivers and reduces their productivity by forcing them to leave more time for travel rather than risk being late. It reduces the reliability of transport, which can impact an organization's inbound and outbound shipments. It makes employers located in high traffic areas less attractive to employees. It increases idling, which contributes disproportionately to pollution. And it increases highway maintenance costs.

At the extreme, traffic congestion can even cause businesses to opt for more commuter-friendly locations—a substantial cost to the losing economy.

With traffic congestion comes accidents, the cost of which doesn't stop at the repair shop. Other costs to both consumers and the economy include property damage, hospital and emergency care, police, fire, ambulance, tow trucks, out of pocket costs, and increased insurance premiums.

Fortunately, lowering traffic volume has a multiplicative impact on congestion. According to a study by Confederation of British Industry, a mere five percent decline in traffic volume can cut time lost in congestion by as much as 50 percent.

Telework Savings Calculator: Traffic and Accident Assumptions

- Accident incidence and costs: based on Department of Transportation and Federal Highway Administration Standards

OTHER COMMUNITY BENEFITS

Beyond the community benefits quantified in this report, widespread telecommuting could:

- Increase the life of infrastructure including roads and transit
- Improve emergency responsiveness
- Reduce road rage
- Reduce overcrowding
- Revitalize cities by reducing traffic
- Increase productivity by reducing travel times

- Provide portable work options for military families
- Reduce the offshoring of jobs and “homeshore” some that have already been lost
- Raise the standard of living in rural and disadvantaged areas
- Help bedroom communities retain the commerce that would otherwise be lost to employer communities
- Reduce terrorism targets of opportunity
- Provide employees access to jobs that would allow them to maximize their potential
- Promote inbound talent migration without adding to local population
- Further reduce travel through widespread use of virtual technologies
- Increase workforce mobility.

Annual Bottom Line on Community Savings:

$73 million in accident related costs
1.8 million barrels of oil valued at $181 million
718 million vehicle miles not traveled
53 million fewer trips
330,000 tons of greenhouse gases (equivalent to 60,000 cars)
3,870 tons of air pollutants a year
$253 million in total community savings

THE BOTTOM LINE

The bottom line on employer savings from 2 day a week telework by those state and local government employees with compatible jobs would total over $4.7 billion a year (see Table 1).

The employee teleworkers would collectively save another $1.1 billion a year.

All that together with the savings from traffic accidents and oil imports, would total over $6 billion a year.

The greenhouse gas impact would equate to taking over 40 percent of Sacramento's solo commuters off the road.

SUMMARY

Telework offers a relatively simple, high return-on-investment solution to some of the state's most critical problems:

- Workforce planners see telecommuting as a way to mitigate the “brain drain” effect of retiring Baby Boomers.
- Human resource professionals see it as a way to recruit and retain the best people.
- Work-life experts encourage it as a way to address the needs of families, parents, and senior caregivers.
- Employees desire it because it saves time and money, and improves the quality of their lives.
- Baby Boomers see telework as a flexible alternative to full retirement.
- Millennial workers appreciate it as a way to work on their own terms.
- Disabled workers, rural residents, and military families find it an answer to their special needs.
- Environmentalists applaud it because telecommuting can significantly reduce greenhouse gases and energy usage.
- Financial managers endorse it for its cost savings and increased productivity potential.
- Urban planners see it as a strategy to fill the growing gap between transportation system demand and supply.
- Governments see it as a way to reduce highway wear and tear and alleviate the strain on the nation's transportation infrastructure.
- Organizations rely on it to ensure continuity of operations in case of a disaster or pandemic.

FROM THE EXPERTS

“Other than a stapler and paper clip, hardly anything about the way work gets done in today's offices is the same as it was ten, twenty or even fifty years ago – except for the office itself,” says telework expert Gil Gordon. “The computing and telecommunications revolution we all now take for granted has taken place in offices that are largely unchanged from a century ago. The lighting is better now and the furniture is more comfortable, but most organizations are still bringing all the office workers to the office most if not all of the time. How archaic! It's time to finally rethink the “where” of office work just as we have done with the “how” of office work. Today's government and private-sector office work in so many organizations is running like a sports car with the parking brake on: all that horsepower can't produce the results needed with the drag of the same time-same place office mentality.”

- Gil Gordon, Gil Gordon Associates

“Whether employers want to admit it or not, the nature of work has already changed and the genie is not going back in the bottle. If employers expect to compete in the years ahead, they need to see work as verb, rather than a noun.”

- Michael Dziak, COO, e-Work.com

“Time and time again leading organizations have demonstrated that telework is an effective operating model that drives direct improvements in employee efficiency and helps slash operational costs. State and Federal Agencies are being asked to achieve these same outcomes but are forced to use a 19th century operating model. The result is far too often reliance on cost saving measures that have significant side effects and negative consequences (furlough days, employee layoffs, and abandoning critical programs). Telework can deliver immediate results for the State, for employees, and for the environment, without the morning-after headache.”

- Ian Gover, President & CEO, Better Workplace

"The savings are real, the business model for telework is proven. My company alone realized over a billion dollars in savings. It's important to note that it is not an all or nothing proposition. You may have some workers who only telework one day a month, others a couple times a week; the important thing is to find the right balance for each individual and the needs of the organization. At Sun, we found that morale and retention were higher with telework users and that we had higher productivity from them. The dirty little secret is that they worked more productive hours and were happier and it was less expensive to support them."

- Scott McNealy, co-founder and former CEO of Sun Microsystems

"We've repeatedly proven that it is possible, even desirable to have successful organizations whose employees are scattered around the countryside. Technology isn't the problem (if it ever was). So why do we still stick to the old ways? Because many of us are still not sure how to get from that traditional, tense, irritable and frustrated state to a new relaxed, pleasant and self-fulfilled existence. Change is scary. So here we are, still making dumb trips."

- Jack Nilles, president of JALA International (quote from the foreword to Undress For Success—the Naked Truth About Making Monday at Home.)

"...here's a deceptively simple action item to put on your agenda for business growth, working families and a green future: Make it the norm for everyone to work at home at least one day a week. That single step could raise productivity, save energy, decrease pollution, reduce traffic congestion, cut household expenses, increase quality of family life, and keep educated women in the workforce."

- Roseabeth Moss Kanter, Ernest L. Arbuckle Professor, Harvard Business School

"In a knowledge worker economy, we need to focus on outcome measures of productivity, not attendance or even output."

- John Sawislak, Senior Fellow at the Telework Exchange

"If you pick the right people and give them the opportunity to spread their wings—and put compensation as a carrier behind it—you almost don't have to manage them."

- Jack Welch, former CEO of GE

"Even though we propose results-based management as an innovation of the last decade or so, it seems to me that results have always been the bottom line. Somewhere along the way we started talking about time—desk-time, face-time, full-time, over-time, as the measurement of what we accomplish and where we accomplish it."

"I am a proponent of flexible and effective workplaces because I believe excellence in management stems from trusting and empowering each person within an organization to do their job to the best of their ability."

- Patricia Kempthorne, Founder/Executive Director, Twiga Foundation, Inc.

"Management by walking around is fine for crumbly organizations that don't trust their employees, but good companies work with their people to establish goals, they give them the tools they need to meet those goals, and then they get out of their way."

- Jack Nilles, JALA and the father of telecommuting

"Supervisors and team leaders may have difficulty figuring out how to manage employees when they can't see them. That's why a focus on performance outcomes is critical. Detail what is expected of your staff—work products, availability, communication procedures—and hold them accountable wherever they are—at the office, the client's office, the airport, the beach or at home."

- Judy Casey, Director at Work and Family Researchers Network

"Telework forces managers to focus on what's important - efficient and effective work, no matter where it takes place."

- Monica Babine, Senior Associate, Program for Digital Initiatives, Washington State University Extension & College of Liberal Arts

ABOUT THE TELEWORK RESEARCH NETWORK

This report was prepared by Kate Lister and Tom Harnish from the Telework Research Network, a consulting and research firm based in San Diego, California.

The company specializes in evaluating the business case for telework and workplace flexibility. They have synthesized over 500 case studies, research papers, and other documents on the topics. And they've conducted interviews with the largest and smallest virtual employers and their employees, telework advocates and naysayers, top researchers, leaders of successful telework advocacy programs, and venture capitalists who have invested in the remote work model. Their research has been quoted in he Wall Street Journal, Harvard Business Review, Inc. magazine and scores of other publications.

Frustrated by organizational reluctance to initiate workplace flexibility, Lister and Harnish co-authored a popular press book, Undress For Success—The Naked Truth About Making Money at Home (Wiley, 2009), to help employees to negotiate, find, or create their own home-based work.

The principals of the Telework Research Network are available for consulting and research projects, custom telework and flexible work modeling for companies and communities, branded web-based telework and flexible work savings calculators, white papers, and public or virtual appearances.

ENDNOTES

<sup>1</sup> U.S. Department of Labor, 2009 Report to Congress shows 61 percent of federal employees hold telework-compatible jobs. The Telework Research Network estimates that based on an agency by agency assessment of jobs, 48 percent of local government and 51 percent of state government jobs in California are telework-compatible. This compares to the overall non-self-employed population compatibility rate of 45 percent for the U.S. total workforce.

<sup>3</sup> a) BLS Work at Home Special Report (2004) showed average of 2.4 days a week; b) Working at home: An update, Perspectives on Labor and Income, Statistics Canada, June 2007. In 2005, teleworkers worked at home an average of 17 hours a week. c) chose 2 days a week because at lower frequencies, the opportunity for financial savings are minimal.

<sup>4</sup> a) WorldatWork.org: 2009 Telework Trendlines shows 79 percent of employees say they would telework if allowed b) 2010 Federal Employee Viewpoint Survey showed only 12.3 percent of employees chose not to telework.

Executive Summary

The signing of the Telework Enhancement Act in December 2010 (the Act), set in motion a transformation of Federal telework that will have the effect of unleashing its potential as a strategic intervention for supporting agency effectiveness. The Act provides a framework of requirements designed to ensure a more systematic implementation of telework in Federal agencies than previously existed and adequate notice to employees of their telework eligibility status. Satisfying these requirements has meant a fundamental shift in how agency stakeholders view and implement telework -- from a strictly individual employee benefit to a strategic organizational change program.

Program Benefits

Telework program benefits extend from the individual to larger communities. Telework's potential to enhance work-life balance for individual employees is well documented. Implemented widely across agencies, telework has the potential to improve quality of life for communities, for example, by reducing traffic congestion and pollution. Increasingly, however, the potential for agency benefits drives telework implementation.

- Aligned with agency strategy and mission, telework supports achievement of objectives increasingly important for operation of an efficient and effective Federal Government, including cost savings and improved performance, and maximizing organizational productivity.
- Developed as a strategic program, telework is a powerful agency recruitment and retention tool with the capacity to improve the competitive position of the Federal Government for recruiting and retaining the best possible workforce. .
- Leveraged as a management tool, telework mitigates potential disruptions to workplace productivity (e.g., severe weather).

About the Research

The research described was designed to satisfy content outlined in the Act and provides a baseline for evaluation of Federal telework programs under the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010. The study for the report draws upon multiple methods (survey, focus groups, and archival data) and provides a robust picture of telework under the Act through the consequent integration of key stakeholder perspectives (agencies, employees and program managers). As in prior reports, the annual agency Data Call provided the core data for the report. However, to reflect program parameters and measures outlined in the Act, the form of the Call used in 2011 was heavily revised from prior administrations. For this reason, telework program results presented in this report are not directly comparable to findings reported for prior years.

Results provide an overview of agency efforts and status with respect to implementing programs as required in the Act, descriptions of how many and how Federal employees telework, summaries of agency goal-setting efforts, and insights into outcomes related to telework. Agency data are quite informative and provide a detailed picture of current Federal telework activities. Program descriptions are particularly valuable and will provide opportunities for interagency sharing of best practices. However, caution should be exercised when participation and frequency findings are reviewed. In the absence of a standardized Governmentwide data collection system or trained data collection staff in all agencies, the final combined telework participation estimates are unlikely to be reliable.

Finally, many agencies do not have the current systems capacity to collect all requested data (e.g., situational telework); final participation and frequency numbers may under-report telework activity, again, with consequences for data quality standards, including reliability.

This same systems limitation must be kept in mind when interpreting results. For example, at the time of the Call, some agencies had not yet developed databases to track the number of signed telework agreements. The mismatch between number of agreements and number of teleworkers reflects this limitation in data collection rather than a failure to ensure signed agreements.

Telework Program Implementation

The Act included a number of requirements for Federal telework programs. These are outlined next with results of data collection shown for each.

Findings must be interpreted with respect to the data collection limitations noted above. In addition, some agencies opted to participate in the Data Call although they were not required to do so under the Act. In some instances, apparent non-compliance with the Act results when such agencies elected not to respond to every item.

- Establish a policy under which eligible employees would be allowed to telework. All agencies responding to the Data Call (87) had established telework policies; 73 percent of which met the requirements of the Act at the time of the Call. Focus group participants described the time-consuming effort of revising policy, and the lengthy internal review processes that made it difficult or impossible to align telework policies with Act requirements in time to meet the June 2011 deadline.
- Designate a Telework Managing Officer (TMO). Practically speaking, all respondent agencies had designated a permanent or acting TMO at the time of the Call. The two that did not were not covered by the Act, and thus not bound to adhere to its requirements.
- Determine and notify all employees of their eligibility to telework. All reporting Executive branch agencies governed by Act requirements had notified agency employees of their eligibility to participate in telework. At the time of the Call, a total of 684,589 agency employees had been determined eligible to telework, representing almost 32 percent of the 2,165,390 employee population reported by agencies.
- Require a written agreement between an agency manager and each of his or her employees authorized to telework. While not every agency has systems in place to track telework agreements, records maintained by the 82 agencies that were able to provide responses show that a total of 144,851 employees have a telework agreement with their managers. Agencies renew telework agreements periodically, in some cases, according to a fixed schedule and, in others, whenever an employee’s supervisor or position changes.

- Ensure that an interactive training program is provided to eligible employees and their managers and that the training is successfully completed by employees prior to entering into a telework agreement (unless specifically waived by the head of the agency). The web-based training posted on the Office of Personnel Management's (OPM’s) telework website (www.telework.gov) was the most commonly reported source of training.
  - Agencies were asked to report the number of employees and managers who had received telework training since the signing of the Act. Again, data collection methods often did not permit points of contact (POCs) to respond to this question. Reportedly, a total of 166,348 employees have been trained since the signing of the Act in December 2010.
  - Of those agencies that track training, the largest number record certificates to establish training completion (26 agencies).
- Adopt telework as a critical management tool into agency Continuity of Operations Plan (COOP). At the time of the Call, 75 agencies had included telework as part of their COOP plans.

While technology enables telework and forms the basis for successful programs, inadequate technology and data security issues are often mentioned as critical barriers to telework. Consequently, the Call included questions to assess technology implementation. Results indicate that more agencies bear the cost of equipping teleworkers (e.g., provide computers to teleworkers) than services to support telework (e.g., internet). Agencies report that steps are routinely taken to ensure data security.

Participation in Telework

The Call asked agencies to report telework participation and frequency during September and October 2011. Although this period of reporting was just a few months after the deadline for meeting Act requirements, a quarter of all employees deemed eligible to participate were reported as teleworking. Teleworkers tend to include more females, older employees, and those with longer agency tenure compared to the Federal population. Evident from the number of respondents, not all agencies were able to collect requested data.

	Total Number of Employees	Employees Deemed Eligible to Telework	Employees with Telework Agreements	Employees Teleworking in Sept 2011
Number of employees in each category	2,165,390	684,589	144,851	168,558
Number of agency respondents	86	82	82	87

Still, as often happens when innovations are introduced, Federal telework faces barriers to full implementation. Asked to describe ongoing challenges, several agencies reported resistance among key stakeholders (e.g., managers) as well as technology and security concerns.

How Often Do Employees Telework?

Achieving telework benefits, such as reductions in energy use, often depend upon how frequently employees telework. The Act also specified the importance of collecting data on the frequency of telework. As of the Call reporting period, many agencies did not have systems in place to track the number of days an employee teleworks. Of those agencies that were able to respond, results indicate fairly low rates of participation tend to predominate, with more than half of agencies reporting that teleworkers spend 2 or fewer days per week teleworking. Only 27 percent of teleworkers were reported as participating 3 or more days per week.

What Happens When Federal Employees Telework?

The Federal Employee Viewpoint Survey (FEVS) allows teleworking employees to be distinguished from those employees who are not able to telework because of a barrier (e.g., limited technology, not allowed to telework). In comparison to non-teleworkers facing barriers to telework, teleworkers are more likely to report knowing what is expected of them on the job and feeling as though they are held accountable for results. Teleworkers also reported a greater sense of empowerment, higher job satisfaction, and a greater desire to stay at their current job.

As in the 2010 report, results show that teleworkers and those who choose not to telework often have similarly favorable work attitudes. It is likely that employees who telework and those who do not experience similarly high levels of workplace autonomy and control. Both characteristics have been shown to be related to positive workplace attitudes.

Goals

The Act requires that agencies report an annual telework participation goal and encourages agencies to set and measure progress towards a variety of other goals. Since this is the first reporting year under the new law, the participation goals provided in this report pose a baseline for agency assessments of progress in the 2013 Report to Congress. Of responding agencies, 41 reported a participation goal as either a percentage or number of employees. Many agencies were still in the process of setting their participation goals at the time of the Call, and OPM will continue to work with those agencies over the coming months.

The Act also asked agencies to report results of assessments of any other goals the agency may have established for telework programs (e.g., emergency preparedness, recruitment and retention, performance). Emergency preparedness was the most frequently mentioned, while less commonly reported goals included reduced commuter miles, energy use, real estate costs, and improved employee performance. While measuring progress towards these goals remains a challenge, this report details examples of some of the innovative ways in which many agencies have begun to assess them.

Telework as a Tool for Achieving Social Goals

The Act directed OPM to initiate a review of the research on outcomes associated with an increase in telework, and make findings available to the public. Included in the appendices to this report are two reviews of the research literature examining the relationship between 1) telework, energy consumption, and transportation and 2) telework and job availability. Results of this review suggest a number of practical tips for approaches agencies could adopt to achieve goals. Examples include:

- Encourage employees with the longest commutes to telework
- Educate employees about how to best save energy while teleworking
- Encourage employers to make telework available to highly sought after and underserved employees (e.g. employees with high demand expertise, workers with disabilities, or Wounded Warriors).

Next Steps

OPM will continue to work in a consultative capacity with agencies to facilitate continuous telework program improvement, advancement of programs, and interagency learning. The focus in 2012-2013 will continue to be on goal-setting, goal measurement, and evaluation.

To address lingering data reliability issues, OPM has worked closely with payroll providers and agencies to develop a Governmentwide set of standards for data collection. These are being implemented by payroll providers and agencies; the resulting automated data collection will be pilot-tested during the summer of 2012. Findings from the pilot will be included in the next reporting cycle.

INTRODUCTION

The signing of the Telework Enhancement Act in December 2010 (the Act) set in motion a transformation of Federal telework that will have the effect of unleashing its potential as a strategic intervention for supporting agency effectiveness. Prior to the Act, telework was largely implemented through case-by-case approval of employees. Under the Act, telework is implemented as a strategic workplace flexibility offering expanded opportunities for participation (to the extent it does not diminish employee performance or agency operations), and the potential to substantially benefit individual employees and agencies alike.

The Act provides a framework of requirements designed to facilitate a more systematic implementation of telework in Federal agencies than previously existed and adequate notice to employees of their telework eligibility status. Satisfying requirements has meant a fundamental shift in how agency stakeholders are asked to view and implement telework -- from an individual employee benefit to an organizational change program. Implemented as a change program, telework supports achievement of objectives increasingly important for ensuring an efficient and effective Federal Government, including cost savings and improved performance. For example, by offering the flexibility many employees need to balance multiple life responsibilities, telework offers an incentive designed to retain high performing employees with consequent financial benefits for agencies. Beneficial outcomes occur directly and indirectly, for instance, through limiting the cost of turnover while retaining important knowledge assets (Horan & Wells, 2005).

Achieving anticipated benefits requires a substantial portion of eligible Federal employees to participate in telework on a regular, ongoing basis. According to reports issued prior to enactment of the Act, relatively few Federal employees teleworked and even fewer teleworked with the regular frequency that research indicates is necessary to achieve meaningful reductions in turnover, cost savings, reduced pollution or other goals (see Bailey & Kurland, 2002, for a review of the research literature, and www.telework.gov for prior status reports). The Act, however, provides the incentive and parameters for making telework more widely available to all Federal employees.

The Act established specific requirements for Federal telework, and satisfying these requirements meant substantial organizational changes in many agencies, with consequences for policies, workplace practices, and, ultimately, workplace culture. Results described in this report provide a new baseline for future assessments of Federal telework under the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010.

The following background section considers the context for Federal telework. The section describes the legislative background, key program requirements outlined in the Act for agencies, and OPM's role in advancing Federal telework -- all aspects of context that work in unison to shape Federal telework.

BACKGROUND

The history and statutory framework for establishing telework began more than a decade ago as an effort to address transportation concerns and grew into an important flexible work arrangement and a powerful recruitment and retention tool for the Federal Government. . Over the years, telework has continued to receive attention due to its potential to improve employee morale, enhance work-life balance for employees, improve the competitive position of the Federal Government for recruiting and retaining the best and brightest workforce, increase Federal agency capacity to achieve mission and operational goals, and maximize organizational productivity.

In recent years, the focus has expanded to view telework as a strategic management tool for coping with potential disruptions in the workplace due to severe weather or other emergencies, and as a recruitment tool to increase access to talent pools. What seems clear is that telework will continue to receive attention within the Federal Government as a human capital strategic tool that provides a number of important benefits and flexibilities to organizations and employees alike.

Legislative History

Congressional interest in expanding the use of telework in the Executive branch began in earnest with the passage of Public Law 106-346 in 2000, which required each Executive agency to establish a policy under which eligible employees of the agency would be permitted to participate in telework to the maximum extent possible without diminished employee performance. Further legislation followed this mandate but the focus was more incremental and targeted specific agencies to increase telework participation by specified amounts.

The Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 (Public Law 111-292), which was signed into law by President Obama on December 9, 2010, built upon previous congressional action and provided a framework for Federal agencies to maximize the use of telework. In addition to establishing baseline expectations for the Federal telework program, the Act provided the legal framework for achieving greater flexibility in managing the Federal workforce through the use of telework. It also assigned specific duties and expanded responsibilities to OPM, and other partner agencies, for directing overall policy guidance to Federal agencies on an ongoing basis in an effort to help them build effective telework programs.

Act Requirements: Executive Branch Federal Agencies

Perhaps the most far reaching and ambitious achievement of the Act was the establishment of a more uniform and consistent approach to telework across the Federal Government. For the first time, Congress provided a consistent definition of what constitutes telework in the legislation, and applied it broadly to encompass most flexible work arrangements that allow an employee to perform his or her work at an approved worksite other than his or her assigned worksite:

“The term ‘telework’ or ‘teleworking’ refers to a work flexibility arrangement under which an employee performs the duties and responsibilities of such employee’s position, and other authorized activities, from an approved worksite other than the location from which the employee would otherwise work.”

Additionally, the legislation established expectations for all Federal Executive agencies with regard to telework policies, program implementation and reporting. A deadline of June 30, 2011, was established for meeting agency requirements in the Act. First and foremost, each Federal agency was required to establish a policy under which eligible employees would be allowed to telework, to determine employee eligibility to participate in telework, and to notify all employees of their eligibility status. Federal agencies continue to exercise maximum flexibility to establish telework policies based on their individual mission and operational needs and to ensure that any such telework program does not diminish employee performance or agency operations.

To ensure consistency and continuity for telework programs across the Government, the Act further directed Federal agencies to:

- designate a Telework Managing Officer (TMO) who would be responsible for policy development and implementation (In addition to serving as an advisor for agency leadership and a resource for managers and employees on all matters related to telework, the TMO also is required to consult and coordinate with OPM to satisfy mandatory annual data collection and reporting requirements.);
- determine and notify all employees of their eligibility to telework;
- require a written agreement between an agency manager and each of his or her employees authorized to telework;
- ensure that an interactive training program is provided to eligible employees and their managers and that the training is successfully completed by employees prior to entering into a telework agreement unless specifically waived by the head of the agency; and
- adopt telework as a critical management tool into its Continuity of Operations Plan (COOP).

U.S. Office of Personnel Management: Advancing Federal Telework

The Act also outlines a number of specific responsibilities for OPM. These responsibilities support the consultative role OPM has long held with agencies, especially in policy guidance, and mandate continued maintenance of the Federal telework website (currently available at www.telework.gov). The Act expands OPM’s role in telework program assessment and data collection, charging OPM to assist agencies in establishing appropriate qualitative and quantitative measures and goals for telework programs. Moreover, OPM, in collaboration with agencies, is required to compile and submit an annual report to Congress on the telework programs of each agency, a requirement addressed here. Specific content is established for the report, for example, degree and frequency of participation in telework by employees in each agency, number and percentage of employees eligible to participate in telework, and results of any assessments of outcomes associated with telework.

The Governmentwide telework program is managed by OPM's Work/Life/Wellness (W/L/W) office. Prior to the Act, the office developed a model for advancing telework (shown below).

In many aspects, the model aligns with the Act, especially in its emphasis on OPM consultative services, evaluation, and measurement. These reinforce the central role of OPM's W/L/W office in the advancement of telework. Model components include:

- Establish: Goals for advancing telework are outlined in the Act and established by individual agencies. W/L/W supports efforts to establish telework goals through workshops, feedback on research results and individual consultations.
- Evaluate: W/L/W conducts ongoing data collection through various research programs to assess agency telework program implementation, processes and outcomes, and assist agencies in similar data collection. Data are collected through custom instruments (e.g., periodic Data Call, focus groups, survey of Federal employees), and other existing sources (e.g., agency surveys, FEVS, payroll and Human Resources data).
- Connect: We share results and useful lessons learned through evaluation with the Federal telework community, including agencies and other stakeholders.
- Support: W/L/W helps agencies develop and implement programs through training (e.g., in telework, action planning, evaluation) and policy guidance. We provide consultative services as needed for building robust individual agency programs (e.g., program implementation, policy analysis).
- Review: We analyze research findings, evaluation findings and lessons learned on a continuing basis to assess Governmentwide progress in advancing telework.

REPORT CONTENT

The scope of the report has been dictated by several objectives, the first being to address content requirements established in the Act. The Act focuses attention on participation in telework agencies, with content spelled out as [Public Law 111-292, 6506(b)(2)]:

- (a) degree of participation by employees of each executive agency in telework;
- (b) method for gathering telework data in each agency;
- (c) reasons for observed increases/decreases greater than ten percent in telework participation;
- (d) agency participation goals for the next reporting period;
- (e) actions taken to identify and eliminate barriers in cases where goals were not met;
- (f) assessment each agency has made in achieving any identified, non-participation goals (e.g., energy use, recruitment, retention, employee attitudes);
- (g) best practices in agency telework programs.

Given OPM's consultative role with agencies, a second objective for this report has been to provide useful information to agencies as they strive to establish, develop, and sustain telework programs. The specific requirements for Federal telework outlined in the Act meant substantial organizational changes in many agencies. Successful change initiatives are directed by evaluation (Worley & Cummings, 2004), consequently, researchers in the Work/Life/Wellness (W/L/W) office, U.S. Office of Personnel Management, took this report as an opportunity to initiate systematic evaluation of Federal telework programs.

At the time of data collection, agencies were finalizing implementation of program parameters established as requirements under the Act (e.g. notifying employees of telework eligibility). Notably, change initiatives cannot produce intended outcomes until they have been fully implemented and the culture change necessary to support telework has occurred. Consequently, this inaugural telework status report under the Act is largely focused on program implementation questions, and broad questions guided the research:

- What portion of the Federal workforce teleworks?
- How are telework programs implemented under the Act?

Results provide a new baseline for evaluation of Federal telework under the Act.

About Goal Assessments and Best Practices

The Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 tasks OPM with reporting “an assessment of the progress each agency has made in meeting agency participation rate goals during the reporting period, and other agency goals relating to telework” [Public Law 111-292, 6506(b)(2)] and “the best practices in agency telework programs [Public Law 111-292, 6506 (b)(2)(G)].”

Establishing just how successful agencies have been in satisfying established goals (participation and outcome) relate to questions of program effectiveness. Some initial insights are provided regarding Governmentwide goals for telework in the analysis of Federal Employee Viewpoint Survey data. Agencies have just established goals for their programs and these are reported in this report. Assessments of how well these goals have been achieved will be reported once agencies have systematic data with the appropriate time-depth to assess their achievement.

Best practices are established by linking evidence of program effectiveness with practice in order to identify those systems and routines that are most likely to result in desired outcomes. At this implementation stage, agencies are in the process of establishing goals and outcomes; it is too soon to describe any particular set of practices as clearly “best.” However, results of focus groups conducted as part of this study are integrated throughout the report and provide insights into practices that agencies have found to be useful for advancing telework (see Appendix 1 for the full focus group report).

The study for this report employed multiple methods in a phased research design. These are described next.

METHODOLOGY

A first step for initiating this telework research project was to operationalize key definitions in the Act. An Interagency Telework Measurement team of agency subject matter and method experts was assembled in January 2011<sup>1</sup>. To operationalize the definition, the team considered an essential question: Who should be included in counts of telework? The final definition guided all phases of research and was included in the data collection instruments described in this section.

Telework is a work arrangement that allows an employee to perform work, during any part of regular, paid hours, at an approved alternative worksite (e.g., home, telework center). This definition of telework includes what is generally referred to as remote work but does not include any part of work done while on official travel or mobile work. See the following clarifications on remote and mobile work.

- Remote work: A work arrangement in which the employee resides and works at a location beyond the local commuting area of the employing organization's worksite. The arrangement generally includes full-time telework (Note: a recent addition clarifies this definition by stipulating that remote work may result in a change in duty location to the alternative worksite (e.g., home).<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The group was assembled and led by Dr. Kimberly Wells, U.S. Office of Personnel Management. Members included acknowledged leaders and experts in Federal telework including: Dr. Wendell Joice, U.S. General Services Administration; Danette Campbell, U.S. Patent and Trademark Office; Pam Budda, U.S. Department of Defense; Aaron Glover, Defense Information Systems Agency; Karen Meyer, United States Navy; Scott Howell, National Aeronautics and Space Administration; Bruce Murray, U.S. Department of Energy; and Dr. Alexis Adams, Christina Heshmatpour, Elnora Wright, and Clint Sidwell, U.S. Office of Personnel Management.

- Mobile work: Work which is characterized by routine and regular travel to conduct work in customer or other worksites as opposed to a single authorized alternative worksite. Examples include site audits, site inspections, investigations, property management, and work performed while commuting, traveling between worksites, or on Temporary Duty (TDY).

The Interagency Telework Measurement Advisory Group further specified two forms of telework for research purposes. They are distinguished primarily on the basis of schedule:

- Routine: telework that occurs as part of an ongoing, regular schedule; and
- Situational: telework that is approved on a case-by-case basis, where the hours worked are not part of a previously approved, ongoing and regular telework schedule. Examples of situational telework include telework as a result of special work assignments or doctor appointments. Situational telework is sometimes also referred to as episodic, intermittent, unscheduled or ad-hoc telework.

The Logic of Telework Programs

Fundamental questions initiated and guided planning for this evaluation of Federal telework. Sample questions asked included:

- Which stakeholders should be included in the data collection effort?
- What resources are necessary for the development of the program?
- What outcomes can be anticipated in the short or long term once the program is implemented?

Following best practices and shown below, a logic model was developed at the outset of the study (shown in Figure 1). It addresses basic evaluation questions and functioned as a guide to the study design and data collection.

Throughout the report, reference is made to telework program implementation and outcomes. As illustrated in the model, implementation questions consider program resources, activities, and stakeholders (shown on the left side of the model). Whether anticipated outcomes are attained depends largely upon how successfully telework programs are implemented. In fact, failure of programs to achieve expected outcomes often reflects a failure to completely or adequately implement a program (Rossi, Lipsey, & Freeman, 2004).

---

<sup>2</sup> This definition reproduced here was in place at the time of the Call and guided agency data collection efforts. At the writing of this report, OPM notes that remote work arrangements may result in the employee working full-time from the location beyond the worksite with only occasional visits to the office, as opposed to the currently more typical telework arrangement, where employees are expected to return to the applicable work site on a regular basis.

Some outcomes can be expected to occur rather quickly with the implementation of a program (e.g., telework participation). Other outcomes, particularly broad community changes (e.g., reduced traffic congestion and pollution), are only recognized once a critical mass in participation and telework frequency has been achieved. Early adopters of innovative interventions like telework usually participate in numbers too small to achieve large-scale community or environmental outcomes.

Research Design

The research reported here is designed to incorporate quantitative and qualitative data gathered from the primary stakeholders shown in the logic model: the agency Data Call (the Call), archival data from OPM's Federal Employee Viewpoint Survey (FEVS) and focus groups with Telework Managing Officers and coordinators. Each data source is used to capture the perspective of a stakeholder group instrumental in the success of telework.

The Call provides a platform for the systematic collection of descriptive data for program practices in each agency. Liberal use of open-ended items is made in the Call, providing some explanatory data from the agency perspective.

Employee data from the FEVS provides an important complement to the agency perspective in that it offers an opportunity to understand telework programs from the “customer” perspective. Results from analysis of FEVS data allow description of Federal employee participation in telework, reasons for non-participation, and participant satisfaction with telework programs. Further, findings from the FEVS also allow for some insights into workplace outcomes related to telework (e.g., job satisfaction, employee development). A major strength of the FEVS is that it allows comparison of teleworkers and non-teleworker experiences and perceptions – a more robust design for establishing linkages between program and outcomes.

Finally, focus groups with TMOs and program coordinators provide rich description of the context in which telework successes occur as well as some of the challenges and opportunities faced by agency stakeholders in establishing these programs. Final results are included in the report to provide important contextual and explanatory data for interpreting results from the surveys.

The table shown in Appendix 3 displays the link between anticipated effects, measures, and data sources. Methods used to assess listed questions/topics are described.

Method Summary

The methodology used in the research is summarized next. For a more detailed description, see the appendices and links referenced in descriptions.

Telework Data Call

Various versions of the Call have been issued to Federal agencies since 2001. The Call has been revised frequently in response to changes in context and Federal telework policy. The current version of the Call instrument was developed to assess program changes made in response to the Act.

Under the Act, Executive branch agencies are required to report telework data to OPM for inclusion in the annual status report to Congress.<sup>3</sup> A number of agencies also were required to report telework participation and frequency data at the sub-agency/component level. Participation in the Call is currently the only way for agencies to comply with data submission requirements in the Act. Note that several agencies not covered by the Act (e.g., the Smithsonian Institution), and thus not required to participate, nonetheless elected to do so.

<sup>3</sup> Section 6501(2) states that executive agencies are those set forth in section 105.

The Call provides the agency perspective through questions that address agency telework participation and program implementation and processes (e.g., how employees are deemed eligible, how employees are trained and equipped for telework). The instrument used for the 2010 Data Call was revised in 2011 to ensure alignment with the Telework Enhancement Act (see Appendix 4 for more details on the methodology of the Call, and see Appendix 6 for the electronic version of the Call included in the on-line survey platform).

The list of agencies included in the Call was compiled using OPM records (lists from OPM Human Capital Officers, lists from OPM statisticians, lists from previous Data Call administrations) and correspondence with agency points of contact (POCs) for telework (see Appendix 5 for a list of agencies and sub-agencies included in the Call survey administration). For each agency, a telework coordinator or TMO was designated to enter agency data into an online survey platform. Access to the platform was gained through a unique username and password assigned to each agency data entry POC. To protect data integrity, only one agency POC was supplied with access to the data entry system.

The Call was administered between October 26 and December 9, 2011. Agency respondents were invited to participate in the Call by email. Three reminders were sent to POCs and TMOs during the administration period for the Call. Prior to issuance of the Call, data entry points of contact for agencies, coordinators, and TMOs attended three briefings on the Call's content and timeline, which included opportunities to ask any questions. Through these meetings, agency POCs and others involved in telework data collection were familiarized with the Call content. In discussion, specific attention was given to definitions, instructions for data collection and the importance of data quality. Briefings were provided in an effort to support reporting of valid and reliable telework data.

The results of the Data Call give insight into agency efforts and progress in implementing the Act, how many and how Federal employees telework, summaries of agency goal setting efforts, and outcomes related to telework. Agency data provide a detailed picture of current Federal telework activities. Program descriptions are particularly valuable and will provide opportunities for interagency sharing of best practices.

Yet, there are some limitations with respect to the participation and frequency findings that should be considered. Agencies rely upon differing methodologies and data sources when gathering participation and frequency data, including time and attendance systems, counts of telework agreements, and surveys of employees. Without a standardized Governmentwide data collection system or trained data collection staffs, the final estimates of combined telework participation numbers are unlikely to be completely valid or reliable. In particular, many agencies do not have the capability with their current systems to collect all requested data (e.g., situational telework). As a result, the final participation and frequency numbers may underreport telework with consequences for the reliability of reported results.

Federal Employee Viewpoint Survey (FEVS)

The FEVS has been administered Governmentwide to Federal employees since 2002. The survey captures employee perceptions regarding how well the Federal Government runs its human resources management systems. Three items in the FEVS address telework. The first asks respondents to identify whether they are eligible to telework. The second item asks employees to choose an answer option that best describes their own participation in telework, with response options enabling teleworkers to be distinguished from non-teleworkers, and to provide reasons for non-participation in telework. The third item asks respondents to rate their satisfaction with the telework program in their agency.

The methodology for FEVS data collection is well-documented elsewhere. To summarize, the survey is administered to full-time, permanent employees of Departments and large agencies and small/independent agencies that accept an invitation to participate in the survey. The source for results reported in this document, the 2011 survey, was collected from a sample of employees in most agencies (see <http://www.fedview.opm.gov> for a more detailed description).

Methodological Distinctions between the Call and FEVS

Our understanding of Federal telework is enriched by the unique and important perspectives offered by the Call (agency) and FEVS (employee). Each resulting dataset addresses important and complementary questions. However, there are differences between the two instruments that drive dissimilarities in findings and make one-to-one comparisons of results inappropriate. These should be considered when interpreting reported findings.

- Perspective. While the Call and FEVS overlap somewhat in content, the unique perspective offered by each should be kept in mind. This difference means that results for the Call and FEVS are not directly comparable. The Call represents agency perspectives and represents official records for telework participation. The FEVS provides an important employee perspective, but is based on individual self-reports and results may differ from official agency records.
- Timeframe. In 2011, the Call and the FEVS represent snapshots of telework behavior at complementary but separate points in time. For past Calls, agency data has varied in the timeframe represented – from single snapshots of discreet time periods to annual averages. In the Act, agencies were given a deadline of June 2011 for implementing telework program requirements (e.g., notify all eligible employees), but not every agency was able to meet that deadline. To achieve an accurate picture of implemented Federal telework, OPM elected to collect data for a specified timeframe directly after the time the majority of agencies had satisfied program requirements. Call instructions directed respondents to report data for the months of September and October 2011, or as near as possible to that time period.

The FEVS was administered prior to the June deadline for implementing requirements under the Act, during April and May 2011. For this reason, FEVS results should not be taken as indicative of the impact the Act may have on telework, especially participation rates. In sum, the FEVS represents a pre-Act baseline, while the Call is more representative of programs post-implementation of Act requirements. Taken together, the two provide a complementary timeline, but results from the two surveys are not directly comparable.

- Baseline Data. Both the FEVS and Data Call instruments administered in 2011 were updated to address requirements in the Act. For this reason, it is difficult to directly compare 2010 and 2011 FEVS telework results regarding participation in telework. Certainly, aligning measurement with the requirements of the Act mandated such a complete overhaul of the Data Call instrument that current findings cannot be compared to results found in the 2010 telework status report. Results from both the FEVS and Call represent new and important baseline data for assessing the impact of the Act on future telework.

Focus Groups: Telework Managing Officer and Coordinators

The Call made liberal use of open-ended items and response options (e.g., “other”) to allow each agency POC plentiful opportunities to expand and explain answers. Such explanations provide important information for understanding unique responses and the contexts in which Federal telework operates, especially barriers and supports to full implementation of programs. However, in general, responses to survey items are not sufficiently systematic or detailed to fully describe the supports or constraints that may operate to advance or hinder Federal telework. Consequently, to collect the necessary qualitative explanatory data, the 2011 research protocol incorporated focus groups held with key stakeholders: TMOs and coordinators.

See Appendix 1 for the full focus group report, including a detailed discussion of methodology. In September 2011, the W/L/W staff conducted four focus groups with agency representatives to learn more about how telework programs have been implemented and managed across the Federal Government. Group participants explored general foundations for telework program success, challenges to the advancement of agency programs, influence of the Act, and key lessons learned by agencies as they continue to develop and expand telework programs.

Focus group participants were chosen at random from a list of agencies (the same list used to identify participants to the Telework Data Call). TMOs and coordinators were invited to participate in the focus groups by email. Every group followed a structured questioning route developed prior to the meetings. Each session lasted two hours. Note-takers recorded each session and the resulting data were content-analyzed to identify recurrent themes, linkages between themes, and unique features of agency telework programs.

Overall, the mixed method research design (i.e., combination of qualitative and quantitative techniques) employed in this study provides a rich and detailed baseline picture of telework in the initial formative stage for Federal telework programs under the Act. Research in subsequent years will continue to expand the scope of questions posed and outcomes examined.

RESULTS

Presentation of results begins by examining agency progress in meeting Act requirements for telework program implementation. Findings draw primarily upon analysis of data from the Call.

Please recall that several agencies not covered by the Act, and therefore not required to participate, elected to respond in the Data Call. As a result, some of the ostensible non-compliance with Act requirements reflected in responses (e.g., appointment of a Telework Managing Officer) is attributable to the participation of these organizations.

Focus group results are incorporated with results from the Data Call wherever possible in an effort to provide a more complete understanding of the supports and/or constraints operating as agencies worked to fully implement telework programs in accordance with the Act. Noted earlier, focus groups also provide important insights into current practices in Federal telework. While it is too soon at this implementation stage to identify practices that might prove to be “best,” focus group findings do outline a number of promising practices. These are described for results whenever possible and at the end of the report to foster interagency learning.

Telework Implementation

Act requirements provide a basic framework for program implementation and standardize fundamental aspects of Federal telework. A focus group participant noted “the Act helped us because it gave us the legal edge we needed to do some of the things we needed to do . . . . The Act helped us to get a better picture of what’s actually going on and to be able to explain telework a bit more. It gave us the spotlight for a little while . . . .”

Results described next show the extent to which Federal telework programs included Act requirements at the time of the Call in the late fall of 2011.

How Have Agencies Met Program Requirements in the Telework Enhancement Act?

Satisfying requirements in the short timeframe allocated under the Act was truly a herculean effort for most agencies, especially given typically slim staff and resources.<sup>4</sup> In some agencies, satisfying the Act essentially meant building a new program, and for other agencies, it meant significantly changing an existing program. A number of agencies were still working to satisfy requirements immediately prior to administration of the Data Call in October 2011. Notably, the effort necessary to implement or transform telework programs varied across agencies. For example, it was more challenging for large agencies when compared with small agencies to notify all employees of their eligibility to participate in telework.

Aligning Agency Telework Policies with the Act

In nearly every agency the telework policy had to be revised in order to align with the Act. The law set forth two limitations -- relating to official discipline for either viewing pornography or being absent without permission for more than five days in any calendar year -- as ineligibility criteria for telework participation [Public Law 111-292, 6502(a)(2)(A)(B)]. Prior to the Act, these criteria were not included in eligibility standards established by agencies, and their inclusion required agencies to revise policies.

Revising and implementing telework policies is a slow and lengthy process involving multiple levels of internal review including, in some cases, bargaining with labor unions. Table 1 shows that although 73 percent of agencies had either existing or new policies that met the requirements of the Act, as of September 30, 2011 (date specified in the question asked of agencies), 26 percent of respondent agencies were still working to update policies to incorporate requirements of the Act. The Smithsonian Institution has a policy in place that does not meet all requirements, but it is not subject to the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010.

Designating Telework Managing Officers

Any successful organizational change depends upon leadership support. It is particularly critical that telework program decisions be aligned with intra-agency strategic thinking and planning, given the potential for telework to influence outcomes for entire departments/agencies. The Act required the head of each Executive agency to designate a TMO within “the Office of the Chief Human Capital Officer or other comparable office with similar functions” [Public Law 111-292, 6505(a)]. This placement ideally brings management of telework programs into the circle of top leadership and ensures alignment with strategic decision-making. At the time of the Call, only two responding agencies had not yet appointed either an acting or permanent TMO. The two that did not were actually not covered by the Act, and thus not bound to adhere to requirements in the Act.

The Telework Managing Officer as of this Data Call is:	Number of agencies*	Percentage of agencies
Permanent	75	86%
Acting	10	12%
We do not currently have a Telework Managing Officer	2	2%
Total	87	100%

*Total number of responding agencies = 87

Creation of the TMO position was a frequently discussed topic in focus groups. According to the Act, the TMO serves “as an advisor for agency leadership...a resource for managers and employees, and a primary agency point of contact for the Office of Personnel Management on telework matters.” Prior to the Act, telework coordinators typically performed many of the functions outlined for TMOs. Under the Act, some agencies appointed coordinators as TMOs, but many more did not, sometimes with challenging consequences.

At the time of the focus groups in September 2011, TMO position implementation was still a work in progress. Participant comments reflected uneven results. In some agencies, the addition of the TMO was reportedly quite effective. TMOs were able to directly access senior leadership, and the relationship between coordinators and TMOs was described as a true partnership.

Other focus group comments revealed less positive situations. For example, while the TMO is meant to serve as an advisor to senior leadership, several focus group participants noted that TMOs have encountered difficulties gaining access to leadership. Limited leadership access makes it difficult to position telework as an effective strategic management tool. Several coordinators also noted that the addition of the TMO position resulted in an extra layer of oversight, making it difficult to complete projects and goals. Such challenges will need to be resolved to ensure future telework program effectiveness.

Notifying Employees of Telework Eligibility

The Act requires agencies to notify all employees of their eligibility to participate in telework. Prior to notifying employees, agencies first determined which employees were eligible. Criteria for ineligibility were established in the Act and include any employee who "has been officially disciplined for being absent without permission for more than 5 days in any calendar year" and/or who "has been officially disciplined for violations of subpart G of the Standards of Ethical Conduct of Employees of the Executive Branch for reviewing, downloading, or exchanging pornography, including child pornography, on a Federal Government computer or while performing official Federal Government duties." [5 U.S.C. 6502(a)(2), as enacted by Public Law 111-292]

Criteria for participating in telework were also established in the Act. These were presented in the instructions defining eligibility for participation in the Call. Respondents referenced this definition to describe eligibility standards for agencies. The definition states:

"An employee is eligible to participate in telework if all of the following parameters are true:

- The employee has not been officially disciplined for being absent without permission for more than five days in any calendar year.
- The employee has not been officially disciplined for violations of subpart G of the Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch for viewing, downloading, or exchanging pornography, including child pornography, on a Federal Government computer or while performing official Federal Government duties.
- Teleworking does not diminish the employee's performance or agency operations.
- For employees participating in the telework program, participation and performance complies with the requirements and expectations of his or her telework agreement.
- The employee's official duties do not require on a FULL daily basis (ALL DAY, every work day): direct handling of secure materials determined to be inappropriate for telework by the agency head; or on-site activity that cannot be handled remotely or at an alternate worksite.
- The employee and/or the employee's position are not disqualified based on additional criteria established by the organization" (see The Guide to Data Standards retrievable on http://www.opm.gov/feddata/GDS/GDS\_A08.pdf).

The last bulleted parameter in the definition assumes agencies may have criteria for disqualifying employees from telework in addition to those listed in the Act. In the Call, agencies were asked to describe these additional criteria, if any. Performance ratings that fell below specified levels were reported most frequently by agencies that listed additional eligibility criteria beyond those described in the Act.

Table 3: Criteria used by agencies for determining eligibility to participate in telework

Additional Eligibility Criteria	Of all agencies	Of agencies with additional criteria
Performance rating not at required level	40%	78%
Required period of employment not satisfied	25%	49%
Category of employee not allowed to participate	14%	27%
Conduct that resulted in disciplinary action	26%	51%
*Note: 45 agencies reported using additional criteria, which represents 52% of respondent agencies.

At the time of the Call, a total of 684,589 Federal employees had been determined eligible to telework. This number represents 32 percent of the employee population of 2,165,390 reported by agencies.

In compliance with Act requirements, most agencies had either notified or were making progress in notifying employees of their eligibility to telework at the time of the Call.

Table 4: Employee eligibility notifications

Other*	1	1%

*Some participant agencies are not covered by the Act and thus are not required to adhere to the Act. In this case, eligibility issues are left to unit directors who respond on an “as requested” basis.

The law did not specify the form that eligibility notification should take (e.g., blanket email, in-person notification), and agencies reported using a variety of methods to contact employees regarding telework eligibility. A “general, mass or agency-wide email” was the most frequently selected response as shown in Table 5.

Table 5: Methods used by agencies to notify employees of telework eligibility

How were employees notified [of telework eligibility]	Number of agencies using method*
All eligible employees were notified via a general, mass or agency-wide email	48

Other	19
Have not notified/finished notifying	11

*Multiple methods are often used by divisions located within the same Department/agency. To respond to this item, agencies were advised to mark all that apply, thus the total exceeds the 87 responding agencies.

Focus group participants described the challenges some agencies faced in notifying employees of their eligibility to telework. As an example, a participant commented that there was “lots of initial push-back from managers who didn’t want to encourage telework. Lots of effort was put into making managers understand that being notified of eligibility does not mean that an employee would be allowed to telework. [We] worked to make managers understand that notifying employees was simply part of Act requirements (law).”

Effective telework programs rely upon continued employee participation. To this end, it is important that agencies notify new hires of their eligibility to telework. Most agencies (86 percent) also reported that they do notify newly hired employees of their eligibility to participate in telework (Table 6).

Establishing Written Telework Agreements

The Act mandates that a written agreement must be established between the manager and an employee authorized to telework before he or she may participate in telework. The Call asked agencies to indicate how many employees had a telework agreement. According to records maintained by the 82 agencies that provided responses to this question, a total of 144,851 employees have a telework agreement with their managers. A comment made by a focus group participant illustrates the diligence with which agencies approached satisfying Act requirements for telework agreements: “We made several changes. We did a big overhaul of the policy that was issued in October 2010 . . . . Some negotiation had to be done. We had to negotiate telework agreements for everybody; they used to be only for regular basis teleworkers.”

Agencies were asked: When does your agency renew telework agreements? Shown in Table 7, agencies renew telework agreements in response to changing circumstances (e.g., change in supervisor) and/or to a fixed schedule.

Table 7: Renewing telework agreements

Training for Telework

The Act requires heads of agencies to ensure that interactive telework training is provided to “(A) employees eligible to participate in the telework program of the agency; and (B) all managers of teleworkers.” [Public Law 111-292, 6503 (a)(1)(A)(B)]

Passage of the Act helped ensure that training was applied more uniformly across stakeholder groups, including managers. Focus group participants illustrate this point, commenting, for example that “There used to be training only for teleworkers, not managers. That’s changed. We had tried to do that before and it didn’t make it until the Act.” This is another example of how the Act, by imposing a mandate, provided the impetus needed by telework program staff to expand certain telework related objectives.

The Act does not specify training sources. Because agencies often use multiple forms of training, the question in the Call listed a number of the forms available to Federal agencies and asked respondents to indicate those training options used in an agency.

Results of manager and employee training options are presented separately in Tables 8 and 9. The most frequently listed source of training for both groups was the web-based telework training available on OPM’s website (www.telework.gov).

Table 8: Telework training sources for managers

*Total responses exceed the number of agencies, because POCs were instructed to mark every applicable option .

In the Data Call, agencies were also asked to report the number of employees and managers who had received some form of telework training since the signing of the Act. With training a prerequisite to telework participation (with certain exemptions specified in Section 6503(b) of the Act), this question was posed as a way of gaining some sense of the influence the Act may have had on advancing telework participation. However, data collection methods often did not permit agencies to respond to this question. Thirty-four agencies were not able to distinguish employees who had been trained after the signing of the Act, and 15 agencies reported that they do not maintain records of telework training. In those that do track training (30 agencies), a total of 166,348 employees have been trained since the signing of the Act in December 2010.

A follow-up question asked respondents to describe how they verify completion of telework training for employees and managers. Of those agencies that track training, the largest number record training certificates (26 agencies). Note that other methods unique to individual agencies were also described, for example, polling of employees, observation of staff meetings where training was provided, and record maintenance by individual managers.

Telework and Emergency Preparedness

As noted previously, the Act recognized telework as an important tool for ensuring continuity of operations in emergencies. The Act directs Executive branch agencies to incorporate telework into the continuity of operations plan of that agency. Consequently, all agency telework programs should show evidence of a concerted effort to incorporate telework into strategies to ensure continued agency ability to meet essential mission and operational goals during an emergency.

In briefings prior to the Call, agencies were advised to consult with emergency preparedness staff for answers to emergency preparedness questions. The same instructions were given in the Call instrument. The intent was to ensure factual reporting based on actual records.

Data entry POCs were asked to indicate how the agency incorporated telework into emergency plans at the time of the Call. Emergency plans are intended to continue operations during emergency situations, adverse weather conditions, natural disasters or other incidents causing disruptions of Government operations. As evident in Table 11, telework is incorporated into agency Continuity of Operations Plans and Pandemic Influenza Plans. Telework policies also typically include information regarding the use of telework during an emergency, and teleworkers are trained in expectations for teleworkers during emergencies.

OPM’s guidance for Federal telework (www.telework.gov) emphasizes the importance of conducting periodic exercises to ensure staff members are experienced and comfortable with telework in an emergency. Twenty-three agencies reported that they do conduct telework exercises for at least those employees required to telework in an emergency. However, many more agency POCs (43) report that they do not conduct telework exercises to encourage employees to gain experience with teleworking in an emergency.

Beyond Act Program Requirements: Technology

Technology drives and provides the foundation for successful telework. Participants to TMO and telework coordinator focus groups emphasized the importance of technology to telework programs. In summary, when technology is inadequately addressed in program implementation and management, technology can become a major barrier rather than a facilitator of the advancement of telework.

An entire section of the Call was devoted to understanding technology implementation and telework programs. Questions began by assessing how agencies equip teleworkers. Unlike prior Calls, the 2011 form treated equipment and services separately.

As shown in Table 14, agencies tend to provide equipment (e.g., computers) to, or share the cost of equipment with, participants in telework (46 agencies). Responses summarized in Table 15, however, suggest it is more commonplace for agencies to ask teleworkers to pay for the technology services that support telework (e.g., internet).

Table 14: How agency teleworkers are equipped

Other	13

Some agency policies require teleworkers to use only agency-provided equipment. Meeting this standard can hinder the advancement of telework, as illustrated in this focus group comment: “This is an austere budget environment, so if you’re an agency with less telework already, and less available equipment, it will be a challenge to equip everyone that will be teleworking.”

Telework can be an important tool for enhancing continuation of essential agency functions in case of emergency (e.g., weather, accidents). Since telework depends upon the support and availability of technology, testing of all pertinent Information Technology (IT) capacities to support telework is a fundamental aspect of program implementation. Moreover, achieving long-term outcomes (e.g., pollution reduction, energy conservation) requires that technology resources be adequate to support widespread and frequent participation in telework. Tests to ensure this capacity are, again, essential.

Table 16 shows that most agencies test IT capacity. Perhaps surprisingly, few agencies (8) report conducting tests according to a regular schedule. Those agencies that reported testing their IT capacity also generally commented that their systems had adequate capacity for handling increased usage due to telework emergencies.

The Act directs the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) to issue guidelines ensuring that adequate information and security protections for information and information systems are available for telework. Fully implemented telework programs include policy guidance aligned with NIST guidance. As shown in Table 17, most agencies (72 percent) report that telework policies are consistent with NIST guidelines.

Substantially more respondent agencies have integrated telework into their overall information security policy (46), rather than develop a separate telework information security policy (15).

Evident in Table 19, Federal agencies have established a variety of protocols for securing personally identifiable information when employees telework. Data security continues to be a key focus for agencies as they implement telework.

Participation and Frequency

Shown in the logic model, employee participation in telework is a critical antecedent to desirable program outcomes. How telework occurs (e.g., frequency) is an equally important consideration. Long-term outcomes, such as improved agency effectiveness, energy savings and decreased pollution, assume widespread and frequent participation in telework. Items in the Data Call provide baseline data for assessing participation and frequency.

Participation and frequency of participation data were collected by agencies using various methodologies. A question in the Call asked agencies to identify how they determined the number of teleworkers. Agencies described a number of methods for identifying participation and frequency of participation, including tracking through a time and attendance system (46 agencies), counting telework agreements (19 agencies), and/or through a customized telework electronic tracking system (11 agencies). Other methods included an internal survey of managers (5 agencies) or polling timekeepers (6 agencies). Many agencies used various methods for collecting participation data.

The Call included several questions probing participation and the frequency of participation. The first question asks:

- Are employees participating in Federal telework programs?

Appendices 8 and 10 detail baseline participation data for each agency and sub-agency that responded to the Call. Summary results are shown in Table 20. Just a few months after implementing the Act requirements, agency records show that 21 percent of all employees determined to be eligible had a telework agreement with their manager. However, 25 percent of eligible employees were reported as teleworking. This misalignment between eligibility and agreements reflects limitations in the data collection systems of some agencies, as several agencies do not yet have a formal system for tracking telework agreements. As seen in Table 20, the number of agencies able to respond varied across items, indicating that some agencies were unable to provide the information.

Table 20: Summary highlights of telework participation as of September 2011

Number of agency respondents to items	86	82	82	87

Agency participation numbers vary both between and within agencies (see Appendices 9 and 11 for detailed participation data by agency and sub-agency). Among agencies, the percentage of eligible employees who telework range from 0 to 82 percent. Some agencies use the number of telework agreements to estimate telework participation; consequently, some reported participation numbers may be overestimates. This is because some employees may have telework agreements in place for emergencies, but choose not to telework on a regular basis. A more accurate picture is likely to emerge as agencies move toward using time and attendance systems to count teleworkers. A planned Governmentwide automated telework data collection system will ensure more valid and reliable data.

The high participation rates shown for some agencies are encouraging evidence of progress in expanding Federal telework participation. However, to satisfy unique mission and operational goals, even low- to mid-range participation may represent effective use of telework for individual agencies. For this reason, care should be taken when interpreting the participation numbers shown in Appendices 8 – 11.

Notable participation rates for large agencies include the Patent and Trademark Office (82%), General Services Administration (59%), Department of the Treasury (48%), Department of Health and Human Services (42%), and the Department of Education (41%). Many smaller agencies reported high rates of participation as well, including the Appraisal Subcommittee of the Federal Financial Institutions Examination Council (70%), the National Mediation Board (77%), the Institute of Museum and Library Services (62%), the Nuclear Waste Technical Review Board (58%), the Federal Labor Relations Authority (57%), and the Committee for Purchase from People Who Are Blind or Severely Disabled (54%).

Participation numbers are also quite diverse within agencies, with some reporting as much as 50 percentage point ranges between their subcomponents. Here again, interpreting the numbers requires some caution. For some agencies, these wide disparities may represent organizational pockets that have been slower to embrace telework. However, for others these disparities may be evidence of their best strategic use of telework as a workplace flexibility. Subcomponents may report fewer teleworkers in instances where employees primarily deliver services directly to clients or work in the field. Comparatively higher participation rates may occur for subcomponents in which employees work primarily in an office setting.

As is typical of change interventions, a number of potential barriers to telework implementation have been identified. In the Call, agency respondents were asked to describe any ongoing challenges they faced in fully implementing telework. Resistance among key stakeholders (e.g., managers) is widely described for change initiatives, and was described by respondents to the Call (see Figure 2) and by TMOs and coordinators in focus groups. Technology and security concerns were described by current agency respondents, paralleling results reported in previous Data Calls. Other barriers reflected in the chart below are inherent in the Federal system. For example, revising policies is a notoriously slow process given the often complex and multi-layered reviews required.

- How do employees telework?

As noted earlier, outcomes often hinge upon frequent and/or regular employee participation in telework. Consequently, the Act specified the importance of collecting data that describes the frequency with which Federal telework occurs.

Table 21: Frequency of participation in telework

	3 or more days teleworking per week	2 days teleworking per week	1 day teleworking per week	Once a month per week
Number of employees in each frequency category	46,023	47,675	41,727	5,637
Percentage of all reported teleworking employees by frequency category	27%	28%	25%	3%
Number of agency respondents to item	84	85	81	39

Totalling 141,062, employee numbers reported for teleworkers across frequency categories sum to fewer than the total number of teleworking employees (168,558). The reasons for the apparent discrepancy vary; in some cases agencies were simply not able to report telework by participation frequency. In other instances, the frequency categories typically describe routine telework, and many employees participate in telework on a situational basis instead.

Agencies reported a total of 21,251 situational teleworkers. Only 35 agencies responded to this question, reflecting the fact that relatively few agencies are currently able to track situational telework. Situational telework can be a particularly important tool in emergency situations, unforeseen weather conditions, and similar circumstances. Consequently, efforts to measure situational telework are an ongoing priority for OPM.

- What are the reasons for non-participation in telework?

One of the telework items in the Federal Employee Viewpoint Survey provides employees with an opportunity to specify not only if they telework, but also to select reasons they do not telework. The 2011 FEVS was administered prior to the implementation of the Act; therefore, it provides important baseline information about behavior prior to the implementation of telework under the Act. As shown in Figure 3 below, required physical presence on the job is the most frequently provided reason for not teleworking (35%). Another 26 percent did not receive approval to telework, even though they perceive their job as being amenable to telework.

What about participation in mobile work?

As illustrated earlier, mobile work is excluded by definition from the counts of teleworkers in the Data Call. However, it is an increasingly popular way for agencies to meet their customers' needs. Relatively few respondent agencies (29 of 87) offer mobile work or were able to track its use. Under these limitations, Call respondents reported a total of 4,238 mobile workers.

Who teleworks?

Ensuring that decisions whether to permit employees to telework are based upon the appropriate criteria and rendered fairly is an important consideration for implementing any new policy. Through both the Data Call and focus groups, agency representatives expressed concerns over equity and described their efforts to ensure that all employees have an equal opportunity to telework if their jobs are amenable to teleworking. Analysis of FEVS data provides some insights into the demographic characteristics of the Federal teleworking population. We also can examine how the demographic characteristics of teleworkers differ from those who do not telework by choice and those who do not telework because of a barrier.

Once again, before drawing conclusions about the following findings from the FEVS, it is critical to note that the survey was administered prior to the Act taking full effect. Thus, reported demographic findings cannot be attributed to changes set in motion by the Act. Prior to the signing of the Act, however, there was substantial momentum to expand telework participation across the Federal Government and results do demonstrate how the expanding telework population has changed since the last FEVS administration in 2010.

Figure 4 and Figure 5 describe the proportion of Federal teleworkers by gender and supervisory status. According to the FEVS, a slightly higher percentage of teleworkers are male (51%) than female (49%). This is a change from the last FEVS administration which found that more teleworkers were female, but as shown in Figure 4, the percentage of women is greater among teleworkers than is typical of the Federal population (49% versus 43%). Additionally, an overwhelming majority (81%) of teleworkers hold non-supervisory positions, a similar proportion to the Federal population (82%).

The age distribution of Federal teleworkers is shown in Figure 6. More than a third of teleworkers are between the ages of 50 and 59 (34%). Far fewer teleworkers are below the age of 40 (24%). This largely reflects the current demographic distribution of the Federal workforce which is generally older. In a related finding, Figure 7 displays the distribution of teleworkers by time in their agencies. Again, only about a third of teleworkers (33%) have been with their current agency for five years or less, while about two thirds have been with their agency longer. In comparison to the Federal population, teleworkers tend to have slightly longer agency tenure.

The next figures, also based on FEVS results, compare the demographic characteristics of teleworkers and non-teleworkers. It is important to note the difference between the previous figures and those that follow. The previous figures show how Federal teleworkers are distributed across various demographic categories as compared to the entire Federal workforce. The following figures show the percentage of employees that telework and do not telework within a variety of demographic groups. So, for example, in Figure 8 it is shown that 18% of male employees telework. In Figure 4, it is shown that 51% of teleworkers are male.

For the purposes of simplifying the analysis, the FEVS telework participation item is collapsed here into three categories: employees who telework, employees who do not telework because of a barrier (e.g., not allowed, limited by technology), and employees that do not telework by choice.

Figure 8 shows that a greater proportion of females telework (24%) than males (18%). Additionally, males (70%) are more likely to report a barrier to participation in telework than females (65%).

Turning to supervisory status in Figure 9 it appears that more supervisors (21%) and managers (23%) telework than employees in non-supervisory positions. However, it is important to note that the differences are small. Moreover, employees in non-supervisory positions (68%) are more likely to report barriers to participating in telework than managers and senior executives (61%). Conversely, managers and executives most often reported choosing not to participate (16%). This is an important point since it is useful for supervisors and managers to telework, if only occasionally. When supervisors model telework behavior it sends a powerful message of support for similar employee participation. The fact that employee participation is somewhat similar across job types represents progress towards achieving wider acceptance of and more equitable access to telework.

Figure 10 compares teleworkers and non-teleworkers by age group. The proportion of employees that telework does not differ much by age, with one exception. Only 17 percent of young employees (age 29 and under) reported that they telework, compared with 20 to 21 percent of employees in other age groups. Employees under age 40 most frequently report barriers to participation (70 to 71%), while employees between 50 and 59 years old and over the age of 60 most often report choosing not to participate (12% and 17% respectively). Notably, some agencies have policies prohibiting telework for employees with short tenures in the agency.

There is evidence that employees with longer agency tenure participate in telework at higher rates than those with shorter tenures. As shown in Figure 11, employees who have worked for the same agency for 20 years or more telework at the highest rate (24%), perhaps explaining the age effect noted above. In comparison, the participation rate for employees who have been with their agency for up to three years is only 18 percent. Employees with the longest tenure are more likely to report choosing not to telework (15%) compared with other groups (10-12%). Those who have been in their agencies ten years or less, more often report barriers to telework participation (71%), compared with employees who have worked with an agency 11 to 20 years (67%) and more than 20 years (61%).

What Happens When Employees Telework?

Described in the beginning of the report, the shift in telework policy in response to the Telework Enhancement Act constitutes a profound organizational change. These change programs are generally engaged to reach individual, agency and community goals. Achieving identified outcomes is, consequently, an essential driver in the adoption of telework in Federal agencies and gauging success means assessing what happens when employees telework.

For the employee, anticipated outcomes related to telework include job satisfaction and other workplace attitudes and perceptions. For the agency, telework may impact recruitment and retention, result in energy savings, reduce building needs, and better emergency preparedness among other outcomes. At the societal level, telework could potentially have beneficial environmental impacts or create new job opportunities for certain individuals.

Evaluating progress in achieving targeted outcomes varies by outcome and agency due to continuing measurement challenges and the fact that many programs are still in early stages of implementation. Yet, the 2011 Data Call and FEVS do provide noteworthy evidence of progress towards setting goals and evaluating outcomes. The following sections describe the evidence for a wide range of employee, agency, and societal outcomes.

Goals and Outcomes: The Employee Perspective

Telework has the potential to contribute to a number of outcomes relating to the experiences of the individual employee. OPM remains committed to encouraging agencies to measure and evaluate outcomes related to employee satisfaction and other aspects of well-being on the job. Outcomes considered here broadly encompass the workplace experience, employee performance, and job satisfaction. The FEVS contains several items that are useful for analyzing how telework impacts the employee.

Once again, for the purposes of simplifying the analysis, the FEVS telework participation item is collapsed here into three categories: employees who telework, employees who do not telework because of a barrier (e.g., not allowed, limited by technology), and employees that do not telework by choice. The following series of charts examine these aspects of telework/non-telework as it relates to a variety of workplace outcomes.

The 2011 FEVS data supports the findings reported in OPM's 2010 telework status report to Congress that teleworkers and those who choose not to telework have much in common, whereas employees who report facing barriers to telework report lower job satisfaction, less positive views of their organization, lower support from their supervisors, and overall lower scores on measures than do their teleworking counterparts.<sup>5</sup> Results overall provide a number of encouraging insights useful as the basis for further study of individual agency programs or action planning for continuous telework program improvement efforts.

As in the 2010 report, results of subdividing teleworker respondents in analysis often show similarly favorable percentages between those who telework and those who choose not to telework. Keep in mind that long-standing research beginning in the 1960s with Hackman and Oldham shows that work characterized by autonomy tends to relate favorably to workplace attitudes. Building upon such findings, very early telework researchers theorized that telework operates to increase the level of employee autonomy with beneficial employee outcomes likely to occur (Shamir & Saloman, 1985).

It is especially beneficial to the psychological well-being of eligible employees when they are given the choice of whether to participate in telework or not. In fact, the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 clearly emphasizes the importance of implementing telework on a voluntary basis.

Managing Performance

Increasingly, the success of telework programs is recognized as being highly dependent upon appropriate performance management practices. OPM outlines a number of components for effective performance management (<http://www.opm.gov/perform/overview.asp>), including setting performance expectations and goals. As in the 2010 report, two FEVS items are examined here. Both relate to aspects of effective performance management, including clear work expectations and a focus on achieving results. Note that in a comparison of findings reported from 2010 with 2011, results were either identical or so close as to be nearly identical. For that reason, 2010 results are not repeated here.

<sup>5</sup> Results reported in this section should not be taken to indicate that telework causes the outcomes described. There are other characteristics of situation or employee (e.g., selection criteria for participation, motivation level) that might account for noted differences between teleworkers and non-teleworkers.

Overall, teleworkers indicate higher scores on items reflecting performance management principles than do those non-teleworkers who face barriers. Consequently, they may be better supported to perform their jobs with excellence than those who are not able to telework.

In responding to question number 6 of the FEVS, teleworkers (82%) were more likely to agree that they know what is expected of them on the job than non-teleworkers who faced a barrier to telework (79%). Among all FEVS respondents, 80 percent agreed or highly agreed with this statement.

More teleworkers (87%) agree that they are held accountable for results than those who do not telework because of a barrier (82%). Eighty-four percent of respondents also either agreed or strongly agreed with the item.

Finally, and related to performance management, teleworkers agree that they have a greater sense of control over work processes (52%) compared with those employees who do not telework as a result of barriers (45%).

Employee Attitudes

In a review of telework research, Gajendran and Harrison (2007) show that participants in telework programs are more likely to exhibit job satisfaction and improved performance than non-teleworking coworkers. Employers care about job satisfaction because of the demonstrated link between satisfaction and employee turnover (a potential cost).

Analysis of the FEVS parallels findings in previous studies. Overall, 71 percent of Federal respondents to the 2011 FEVS reported being satisfied or very satisfied with their jobs. Figure 15 shows a remarkably larger percentage of teleworkers (75%) and non-teleworkers by choice (79%) report satisfaction with their jobs than those who are not able to telework (68%).

Expressed satisfaction with an agency telework program is an important outcome and an indicator of program success. An initial review of FEVS results suggested a disappointingly low rate of satisfaction with telework among Federal employees (38%). However, Figure 16 shows that such unfavorable perceptions are more likely to result when employees face barriers to program participation. Importantly, a far greater percentage of teleworkers report satisfaction (72%) when compared with those employees who were not able to telework because of barriers (9%) or simply chose not to telework (35%).

Work-life programs such as telework are often implemented to help employees manage the stress that can arise from conflicting work and life responsibilities (Bailey and Kurland, 2002). Employee perceptions of supervisors as supportive of needs to balance work with other life responsibilities may help relieve stress and lead to more positive work experiences. Figure 17 shows that more teleworkers perceive supervisors as supportive of their efforts to balance work with other life issues (85%) than employees not able to telework because of a barrier (74%).

Figure 17: Perception of supervisor support by telework participation

Among respondents to the 2011 FEVS, 69 percent agreed they would recommend their organization as a good place to work. Again, more teleworkers (74%) than employees who were prevented from telework (66%) agreed with this statement (Figure 18). This finding suggests a potential marketing value associated with telework programs, as happy teleworkers share positive impressions of their agencies with potential applicants.

Finally, telework typically relates to employee retention, with teleworkers more likely to express an intention to remain with an employer (Gajendran & Harrison, 2007). Figure 19 parallels previous findings and shows that fewer FEVS teleworker respondents (72%) and non-teleworkers by choice (77%) expressed an intention to leave their current organizations as compared with those not able to telework because of a barrier (68%).

Telework and Unintended Consequences

Employees may hesitate to telework and some managers fail to support participation in telework because of concerns regarding possible unintended negative consequences. In an extensive review of telework research, Bailey and Kurland (2002) reported the potential for social and career isolation as a possible negative unintended consequence of telework. Employee isolation can lead to reduced performance as described by Golden, Veiga and Dino (2008). Opportunities for meeting colleagues in passing are regarded as key opportunities for unplanned or serendipitous knowledge exchange. To the extent that telework reduces such opportunities, telework could potentially reduce overall knowledge sharing in workplaces (see Horan & Wells, 2005).

The FEVS includes items that allow exploration of these possible unintended negative consequences. Figures 20 to 23 compare teleworkers with respondents not able to telework on FEVS items that relate to employee development and knowledge sharing with encouraging results. Overall, a higher percentage of teleworkers (73%) than those not able to telework (61%) agree that they have access to skills development, while 65 percent of teleworkers agree that they have opportunities to put their talents to good use, compared with 57 percent of those unable to telework. Finally, more teleworkers (78%) perceive their colleagues as engaging in knowledge sharing when compared with respondents not able to telework (71%).

Goal Setting: The Agency Perspective

The Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 requires that agencies report an annual telework participation goal and encourages agencies to set and measure progress towards a variety of other goals. Once established in 2012, agencies are required to make an annual assessment of progress towards meeting participation rate goals and explain whether they have met their goals. In cases where agencies do not meet goals, they must detail actions to be taken to “identify and eliminate barriers to maximizing telework opportunities for the next reporting period” [Public Law 111-292, 6506(b)(2)(E)].

Since this is the first reporting year under the new law, the participation goals provided this year will be a baseline upon which agencies will assess their progress in the 2013 Report to Congress. Not all agencies had completed the process of updating their telework policies as of the data collection period. Consequently, not every agency was able to set a participation goal for this report.

Participation Rate Goals

Of responding agencies, 41 reported a participation goal as either a percentage or number of employees. Some agencies chose to report a percentage of total employees whereas others reported a percentage of eligible employees or a percentage increase over the past year’s participation rate. One agency felt comfortable staying at its present level of participation and two agencies reported 100 percent participation.

For a variety of reasons, some agencies were either not ready or unable to specify a participation goal. First, since the Act took effect in December 2010 and agencies were not required to notify employees of eligibility until June 2011, many agencies were still in the process of setting and finalizing their policies at the time of the Call. In such cases, agencies avoided prematurely setting a participation rate goal before their new policies took full effect. Additionally, setting a participation rate goal requires the ability to accurately count the number of teleworkers. Since a number of agencies are still struggling with measurement, some agencies may be unable to set a goal at this time.

In total, 27 agencies did not report a participation rate goal. Additionally, 19 agencies declined to give a goal in terms of percentage or number of employees, and gave descriptive responses instead. These other responses included: (1) explanations for why a goal has not been set, (2) aspirational goals, (3) goals to be achieved for number of employees with telework agreements, and (4) the desire to remain at current levels of participation. Full responses can be found in Appendix 7.

Other Goals

The Telework Enhancement Act also encourages, but does not require, agencies to set and assess progress towards meeting other goals through telework – such as emergency preparedness, energy use, recruitment, retention, performance, and productivity. In this year's Call, several new items measured how many agencies have set non-participation goals. The results can be found in Table 22. Analyzing how agencies have begun to measure goal attainment will provide evidence useful for identifying best practices.

Given the emphasis placed on agency continuity of operations (COOP) in the Act, it is encouraging to see that emergency preparedness goals were the most frequently mentioned. Telework has been promoted across the Federal Government as a way to maintain operations during emergency situations and the Call confirms that many agencies have included telework as part of COOP and pandemic influenza plans.

Less commonly reported goals include reductions in commuter miles, energy use, and agency real estate costs, as well as improved employee performance. Based on the results of qualitative data collected in the Call, it appears that agencies are facing challenges when measuring these goals. The lack of readily available data and the difficulty of measuring these outcomes may be dissuading more agencies from focusing attention here.

Agencies reported goals paralleling commonly reported benefits of telework in the academic literature, including improved employee attitudes and recruitment and retention. Again, ease of measurement may also play a role. A number of tools already exist for measuring these outcomes including the FEVS, internal job satisfaction surveys, and new employee and exit surveys.

Table 22: Agency goals for telework

Outcome Goals	Yes	No	Number of Responding Agencies
Emergency preparedness	72	8	80
Improved employee attitudes	58	22	80

Improved employee performance	34	46	80
Reduced energy use	26	54	80
Reduced or avoided real estate costs	25	55	80

Table 23 summarizes the responses to a question regarding agencies' realized cost savings. For 29 agencies, cost savings estimates are still in the planning stages, and 15 agencies either do not track this information or have no reported savings. This provides further evidence that estimating savings and measuring outcomes remain a work in progress. Still, several agencies did report fewer absences and reduced space needs, utility bills, and transportation subsidy expenditures.

Measuring Outcomes: The Agency Perspective

The following sections summarize how agencies have measured outcomes so far and highlight best practices for advancing telework in Federal agencies. At this early stage of the implementation process, agencies have been revamping their policies, working to expand access to telework, setting goals, and building their telework staffs. Agencies vary tremendously in size, personnel and resource availability, as well as how far along they are in the implementation phase of program development. As a result, measuring telework program outcomes remains a work in progress, and it is too soon to clearly establish any particular practice as “best.” Yet, from the 2012 Call we found evidence of innovative methods of measuring progress towards meeting goals.

Recruitment

Multiple agencies include telework in job announcements. Several have plans to conduct internal surveys and focus groups of new employees to determine telework’s impact on their decision to join the agency. Others mentioned using existing data sources such as the FEVS and other large scale surveys, while several agencies also reported that they do not know how to or do not currently have plans to measure this outcome.

- U.S. Patent and Trademark Office: Patent examiners participating in a full-time telework program have a lower attrition rate (3 percent lower in FY2010) than the patent examiners not on a full-time telework program.
- National Transportation Safety Board: The agency hired back an employee by allowing him to telework full-time while finishing a graduate degree out-of-state.

Retention

Agencies reported using exit surveys, internal satisfaction surveys, internal focus groups, the FEVS, and anecdotal evidence to measure retention.

- National Transportation Safety Board: The agency has been able to retain several employees in mission-critical positions that are difficult to backfill, who have relocated to other states for personal reasons by allowing them to telework on a full-time schedule.
- Farm Credit System Insurance Corporation (FCSIC): The FCSIC currently has one employee teleworking on a short-term basis due to a medical condition. Had this employee not been permitted to telework, she might have retired earlier than planned.
- PTO: The Trademark organization began its hoteling initiative in 2002, with the Trademark Work at Home (TWAH) hoteling program for Trademark examining attorneys. For the five years prior to the program, Trademarks had an average resignation rate of 9.62 percent. From 2006 to 2010, the most recent five years since the incorporation of the TWAH hoteling program, the average resignation rate was 3.03 percent. In a Trademark perception survey, 90 percent of hoteling respondents indicated the TWAH program has influenced them to stay.

Improved employee performance

Fewer methods of measurement were reported for this outcome, indicating that agencies are still considering ways to measure performance. A few agencies stated that telework requires a certain performance rating, acting as an incentive to increase performance either to maintain or gain access to telework. Others cited the FEVS, internal management surveys, employee satisfaction surveys, and focus groups as methods of progress towards this goal.

- Defense Nuclear Facilities Safety Board (DNFSB): In the Board's internal telework survey, employees indicated they were more productive on the days they teleworked due to fewer interruptions and they tended to work longer because they did not have to spend time commuting. Employees must be rated at least "Fully Successful" to telework; employees who want to continue to telework are motivated to maintain good performance.
- Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC): The Telework Survey revealed that over 70 percent of our managers agree that teleworkers' productivity increases or remains the same, and 80 percent of employees believe teleworking increases their productivity.
- PTO: In Fiscal Years 2009 and 2010, examiners participating in the Patent Hoteling Telework Program (PHP) worked, on average, approximately 14 more examination hours, including overtime, per year than non-PHP examiners. With the average PHP examiner having more examination hours than a non-PHP examiner, the resulting gain in productivity is approximately 5.7 full-time equivalents (FTEs,) which are the same as approximately six additional patent examiners working for a full year.

Improved employee attitudes/job satisfaction

Agencies most frequently reported comparing the results of the FEVS on employee attitude measures year- to -year. A few agencies mentioned their own internal employee satisfaction surveys, focus groups, and exit surveys.

- DNFSB: Prior to the 2011 FEVS, employee satisfaction with the Board's telework program was extremely low. To address this problem, in the fall of 2010, management directed that core telework be piloted in the spring of 2011. Employee satisfaction with telework increased from 7.9 percent in 2010 to 55.3 percent in 2011.
- National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB): From the 2011 FEVS, 80.8 percent employees were either very satisfied or satisfied with the telework program, a 26.6 percent increase over the last few years.

Emergency preparedness

Many agencies described the role of telework in their emergency planning (e.g., as part of COOP, pandemic plans, encouraging unscheduled telework). Only a few described measurements for assessing this as an outcome. Common methods included tracking periodic exercises or tests, measuring numbers of log-ins to agency systems during tests or emergencies, and examining time and attendance records during emergencies. One agency used increases in telework agreements as evidence of emergency planning success.

- PTO: The existing telework program provides PTO with the ability to continue some everyday business operations during an emergency beyond those defined in the COOP plan. For example, during the February 2010, snowstorm closure, the Trademark Assistance Center continued to answer public inquiries with 91 percent answered in 20 seconds, which was better than the average performance for the previous quarter. The Trademark examining corps accomplished 85 percent of the production that they did in the same four days of the prior week even though the rest of the Government was shut down. Without telework and hoteling, the agency would have been completely unproductive during this time. In addition, while the Federal Government was closed for four full days, patent examining time was only down about 19 percent for the bi-week. The variety of flex work schedule programs and telework likely contributed to the PTO not losing closer to the full 40 percent patent examining time potentially lost during the four days of Government closures.
- Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC): We plan to measure the use of telework for emergency preparedness through reports using NotiFind, WebTA (web-based time and attendance system), and/or our payroll provider's reporting center (Datamart).

Reduced energy costs

Only three agencies (PTO, Farm Credit Administration, and National Council on Disability) reported measuring energy costs (via avoided office space needs). Agencies cited barriers to measurement, such as leasing their buildings or not having direct access to or control of their utility use data. A few have established working groups to study this and others cited energy use reductions as part of broader sustainability plans, but provided no metrics for measuring reductions.

- PTO: Given that we would have had to lease 1/3 of the campus – 2 more buildings (approximately 776,000 RSF) – were it not for Telework, we would likely have spent an additional $2,401,933 annually for electricity costs (based on the campus total for FY2011 Q3).

Avoided real estate costs

Several agencies described eliminating some office space as a result of telework, but few were able to translate this into dollar figures or square-footage of space saved. Several had established working groups to study real estate cost measurement. Several agencies were making strategic use of hoteling, office sharing, and unique floor designs to save space.

- Department of Agriculture: Plans are underway to capture and collect data on individual eligibility as well as unique facility location identifier in an automated fashion. This capability will enable the Department to track and capture data on underutilized facilities that may house employees who are, in large part, able to telework. This data will enable the Department to make strategic decisions on closures or consolidation of office space based on the ability to increase telework.

- Department of Commerce: The agency is working to reduce space through a three part strategy: 1) identify consolidation opportunities; 2) look for reduction savings in expiring leases before new contracts are made; and 3) review all planned and existing leases for savings as well as eliminating any excess or underutilized owned space. Reduction savings can come from implementing three day or more per week telework, reducing space through open floor design, reduction of support space, and setting workstation size standard.
- Department of Labor: The agency has been aggressively reducing its real estate requirements by reducing the work space footprint of individual workers and requiring that new space is built in a ration of 80 percent workstations and 20 percent private offices. "Hoteling" also is encouraged. The agency also seeks to consolidate bureau populations (minimizing travel time between office functions), and by providing more open, collaborative office designs. Lastly, a lease replacement/consolidation prospectus is being prepared that, if approved and developed, will make substantial use of hoteling and similar practices.
- General Services Administration: The agency uses space reconfiguration to provide enhanced hot-desking, hoteling, and desk sharing options.

Reduced commuter miles

Several agencies reporting that transportation subsidy costs decreased as a result of telework. A few reported collecting or planning to collect data from employees, without specifying which data they would collect. The Office of the U.S. Trade Representative calculates commuter miles saved and compares year to year. The Department of State tracks miles saved by teleworkers using an online application that employees complete. The National Council on Disability reduced parking facility need. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights estimated commute miles saved from the number of full telework days.

- PTO: PTO fourth quarter FY 2011 telework data indicates that 2,322 employees teleworking five days per week translates to 28,647,675 miles reduced in a year and 15,040 tons of emissions reduced in a year. 1,142 employees teleworking four days per week translates to 11,271,540 commuter miles reduced in a year and 5,918 tons of emissions reduced in a year.
- Department of Transportation (DOT): DOT is working to develop a "commute days avoided" metric, which will be comprised of a calculation of employees' telework hours recorded in a time & attendance system and employees' regular days off (RDO).

Goals and Outcomes: The Societal Perspective

In addition to individual employee and agency outcomes, telework is often implemented as a means for achieving broader societal goals, as shown in the logic model (pictured above in Figure 1). For example, using certain telework program designs, large-scale participation in telework could contribute to energy use reduction, pollution control, and traffic congestion relief. Offering telework as a workplace flexibility could also result in increased job availability.

The Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 tasked OPM with researching “the utilization of telework by public and private sector entities that identify best practices and recommendations for the Federal Government” and reviewing “the outcomes associated with an increase in telework, including the effects of telework on energy consumption, job creation and availability, urban transportation patterns, and the ability to anticipate the dispersal of work during periods of emergency.” See the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010, Pub. L. 111-292 (Dec. 9, 2010) at section 4. Congress requested that such studies or reviews be made available to the public.

In 2011, two literature reviews were compiled by OPM researchers. They respond to the Act by summarizing research that addresses private sector practices in telework and telework as a tool for reducing energy use and environmental impacts, alleviating traffic congestion, and increasing job opportunities (See Appendix 2 for complete contents).

Evidence from the review of the literature suggests that agencies with energy, transportation and job availability goals should consider the following program design elements, when appropriate, in order to maximize telework’s impact on broad social outcomes.

Telework, Energy, Transportation, and the Environment

- Maximize hoteling where possible in order to decrease office space.
- Encourage teleworking for those with the longest commutes.
- Be aware of potential home energy use increases and potential cost transfer to employees
- Consider pollution and emissions differences between home and office mix of energy sources.
- Develop a variety of telework arrangements that can be flexibly applied, such as combining telework with other flexible schedules.
- Use information and communication technology effectively.
- Educate teleworkers about how to save energy while teleworking.

Increasing Job Availability through Telework

- Identify and consider how to address strategic agency needs through expanded opportunities for telework (e.g., retention of knowledgeable employees nearing retirement).
- Encourage the use of telework as a recruiting and retention tool for highly sought after employees
- Increase awareness of existing opportunities to telework through recruitment efforts.

The extended contents of the literature reviews can be found in Appendix 2. On these and other societal level telework goals, future research is needed within Government and in the broader research community in order to gain clarity on the potential impact of telework on society.

CONCLUSION AND NEXT STEPS

To conclude the 2012 Telework Status Report, results overall provide evidence of remarkable efforts on the part of agencies as they have worked to adjust telework practice to align with the Telework Enhancement Act. Agencies, overall, have made tremendous strides to address and satisfy mandated requirements, and results reported from multiple data collection efforts suggest that the major work of implementing programs has been addressed. Federal telework is being transformed into the strategic management tool that many in the telework community have long envisioned.

In terms of next steps, agencies will continue to develop and advance telework programs. As described in the beginning of the report, OPM will continue to actively consult with agencies to assist in such endeavors. Realizing the true potential of telework requires integrating telework programs into the business of agencies, ensuring alignment with agency mission and work. Integration at this level places telework squarely in the realm of organizational change. Evaluation is key to any successful program of change, and OPM will carry on its work with agencies to help them to develop internal change and evaluation capacities through continued training in measurement, goal-setting, and action planning.

Effective program development requires continuous evaluation and feedback. Accurate and useful evaluations, in turn, rely upon valid and reliable sources of data. As mentioned throughout the report, agency practices and data collection methods vary too widely to provide reliable data. To ensure that ongoing agency and Governmentwide evaluations are informed by data of the highest quality, as well as to reduce the manual reporting burden for agencies, OPM will continue to work with the Federal Shared Service Centers and agencies to automate the collection of telework data via the Enterprise Human Resources Integration (EHRI) HR and Payroll data feeds. An employee's telework eligibility and usage will be collected, summarized and reported to OPM via the monthly EHRI HR-Status data feed and bi-weekly EHRI payroll data feed. OPM will be able to analyze these data to explore links between telework and important agency outcomes, especially factors related to productivity and cost (e.g., leave use).

The work of establishing a Governmentwide automated telework data collection system is currently underway. OPM recently released new standards for the telework data to be collected via EHRI. In addition, an updated version of the Governmentwide reporting requirements contained in the Guide to Human Resources Reporting (GHRR) was recently published. OPM will begin collecting pilot data in late summer and begin the work of establishing data reliability and validity through standard professional tests of data during the fall of 2012. OPM will also continue to work with both the Shared Service Centers and Agency

Telework Managing Officers to ensure a thorough understanding of the reporting requirements.

Development of robust programs and the successful advancement of telework also depend upon interagency learning and sharing of best practices. To that end, OPM will continue to hold interagency meetings and learning forums. Work/Life/Wellness staff will also investigate ways to leverage the many opportunities afforded by technology to facilitate interagency learning, including Communities of Practice.

The focus groups held for this report provided a wonderful opportunity to include the voice of agency experience in the annual status report to Congress. They also provide important insights useful for understanding the current state of telework program development and current practices in Federal telework. While it is too early at this implementation stage to identify practices that might prove to be “best,” focus group findings do outline a number of promising practices for advancing Federal telework. Moreover, focus group comments are thought-provoking and should prove useful in fostering interagency learning as agencies work to improve programs. For these reasons, and by way of closing the report, practice recommendations from agency focus groups are reproduced here (for the full report, see Appendix 1):

Lessons Learned

Gain Leadership Buy-In

Several participants agreed that gaining buy-in from leadership members at all levels is key to a successful telework program. Comments indicate that gaining leadership support can truly be the catalyst for effective implementation, and buy-in occurs when managers try it for themselves.

Involve Critical Functions

The importance of partnering early and often with union representatives and IT experts within agencies was mentioned as particularly instrumental to the success of telework programs. Involvement of all critical parties and functions will limit the number of unexpected surprises and is important for ensuring the effective collaborations necessary for long-term success.

Institute Reliable Data Collection

Participants also commented that instituting a reliable data collection or tracking procedure is critical to demonstrating telework success and as a tool for long-range planning and managing for program effectiveness. One participant commented, “As a whole, we need to have a better system for tracking telework. Providing data for the OPM Data Call is difficult for many who have to manually track telework participation.

Governmentwide, we need to make it easier to collect and report data.” Other participants noted that online application systems need to be comprehensive before going live to ensure seamless application. This is another area where partnership with IT and security experts is crucial.

Standardize Eligibility and Participation Criteria

Participants described the importance of standardizing eligibility decisions and notification. Some agencies notify their employees via mass email and/or during new employee orientation, while others prefer managers to send individual emails. Participants agreed that part of increasing trust in the telework process is to make sure that communications and notifications are handled fairly and according to established standards across an agency.

Measure Performance Accurately

Agencies reported facing challenges of performance management in advancing their telework program. Participants stressed the need for performance management systems to measure the outcome of completed tasks and goals. They agreed "managers want to know exactly what teleworkers are working on when out of the office". It is critical for performance management systems to directly link to agency-wide performance plans.

Be Patient

Lastly, several participants emphasized the importance of remaining aware that change takes time and progress with telework requires patience. One participant suggested that one way to address this is to make sure that telework goals and objectives are clear and shared across an agency and that information about progress toward those goals is also shared on an ongoing basis.

Appendix 1: Focus Group Report

2011 Telework Focus Groups: Summary of Results

Introduction

In recent years, both Congress and the executive branch have increasingly promoted telework to help achieve important public policy goals. Most recently, agencies have worked hard to comply with the requirements of the Telework Enhancement Act (Public Law 111-292) (the Act), which was signed into law in December 2010. To address the Act's requirements, some agencies have built new programs; others have extensively transformed agency telework, while others have revitalized existing programs. Understanding these current practices is an important first step toward identifying "best practices" and the development of robust telework programs across the Federal government.

The U.S. Office of Personnel Management's (OPM) Work/Life/Wellness (W/L/W) Office is responsible for supporting Federal agencies in implementing and managing effective telework programs. Among other responsibilities, OPM provides telework policy guidance to agencies, assists agencies in defining and establishing appropriate telework measures and goals, assesses agency progress in telework program development, and conducts research on critical issues relevant to the application of telework practices and procedures. OPM's W/L/W Office conducted focus groups for at least two reasons. First and foremost, in support of W/L/W consultative efforts with agencies, we sought to gain an understanding of the general environment for telework in agencies through group discussion. Our second intention was to gain a systematic perspective on the successes and challenges agencies may have encountered as a result of the Act. In fact, in every focus group discussion, agency efforts to address Act requirements figured as a constant reference point for participants. Even questions probing more general aspects of telework tended to elicit responses that referenced the Act, demonstrating its influence on participant perspectives.

Overall, the integrated focus group results presented in this report provide insights into what has worked well for agencies in terms of telework implementation, what the Act has caused agencies to focus on, and what has been challenging for agencies as Telework Managing Officers (TMOs)<sup>6</sup> and coordinators seek to better manage their telework programs. Individual names of agencies will not be discussed as stated in the focus group protocol for each session. This measure was adopted in order to encourage participants to speak freely.

<sup>6</sup> Telework Managing Officers were established in the Act and are part of the "Office of the Chief Human Capital Officer or comparable office with similar functions." The TMO is "devoted to policy development and implementation related to telework programs." Further, he or she serves "as an advisor for agency leadership...a resource for managers and employees, and a primary agency point of contact for the Office of Personnel Management on telework matters..."

The organization of this report follows the same order as the questions and topics actually used to guide the focus groups (see Appendix A for the structured questions used in all focus groups). It begins with more general aspects of telework and proceeds through topics related to Act implementation. Report sections provide an overview of top-ranking responses to structured questions in the protocol. Notable quotes outlined in each section illustrate agency perspectives and provide detailed insights into Federal telework. The report ends by outlining lessons learned shared by participants.

Methodology

In September 2011, the W/L/W staff conducted four focus groups with agency representatives to learn more about how telework programs are being implemented and managed across the Federal Government. Two groups were conducted with agency TMOs, and two groups were held with telework coordinators. Participants were chosen at random. Thirteen agencies were represented in the coordinator focus groups, and eight agencies were represented in the TMO focus groups. All groups met for approximately two hours. During the focus groups, W/L/W researchers facilitated discussion by leading participants through a series of structured questions. The questioning route was developed with reference to telework survey results, existing telework literature (Kurland and Bailey 2000, Nassar-McMillan and Borders 2002), and the Telework Enhancement Act. Two W/L/W researchers conducted each focus group; one served as the focus group facilitator and the other recorded focus group comments using a laptop computer. Focus group size ranged from four to eight participants.

Focus group data were analyzed in accord with the method outlined by qualitative data analysis experts, Miles and Huberman (1994). The procedure began with a thorough review of the notes obtained by the recorder of each session. The results of the TMO and coordinator focus groups were maintained in separate files for organizational purposes and analysis. Recurring themes were identified through a detailed review of focus group notes by individual researchers. Themes were identified by teams of independent reviewers and confirmed by comparison of results from pairs of researchers. Points of divergence were discussed for the final identification of key themes. Themes identified across all groups are reported below.

What Works Well

Focus group discussions began on a positive note by asking participants to describe what was going well in telework programs. The focus groups were held in September, just as TMOs and coordinators were winding down a huge effort to satisfy Act requirements. Satisfying requirements meant revising policies, determining employee eligibility to participate in telework, and considering aspects of program implementation such as teleworker training. Not surprisingly, such topics were foremost in the minds of TMOs and coordinators and, consequently, heavily considered in participant descriptions of what was going well in their telework programs.

It is encouraging to note that the efforts agencies were required to make in response to the Act were mentioned prominently as areas of success. In fact, as a result of the Act, participants reported that more managers and their direct reports recognize the benefit of telework. In testifying to the heightened attention to telework since the enactment of the Telework Enhancement Act, one participant commented, “The Act helped us to get a better picture of what’s actually going on and to be able to explain telework a bit more. It gave us the spotlight for a little while.”

Themes described next reveal both common experiences and experiences that were unique to respective agencies. Therefore, even topics that were popular and addressed by several agencies show small percentages in final results.

Of the 21 total participants,

- 5 participants (24%) commented that training has gone well,
- 4 participants (19%) reported that leadership support has been a factor that has worked well in their telework programs,
- 6 participants (29%) noted that communication has gone well, and
- 3 participants (14%) shared that telework policies and procedures have been an area of strength.

Please see Figure 1 for a graphical representation of the focus group results regarding what has worked well for agencies as they develop telework programs.

Training

Effective training also proved to be an important consideration for program success and is a program aspect a number of participants defined as going well. A common concern among leadership was the ability to manage teleworkers. In order to decrease these concerns, agencies provided training for managers. These exercises have helped capture telework endorsements by managers. Training for teleworkers also was highlighted as a successful component of agency telework programs. Participants recalled the use of training support and materials provided by OPM on telework.gov. Other agencies developed their own training programs in the form of classes and workshops to provide new teleworkers the opportunity to address potential challenges. For example, one participant related, “my agency developed its own training. Our top leader assumes training should help advance telework, and encourage support from managers. Also, the training should help employees to really understand how to better telework.”

Leadership and Other Supports

Participants expressed the importance of obtaining manager and executive buy-in. Some participants reported that they were able to obtain buy-in by encouraging leadership to think positively and creatively about which positions are appropriate to telework, particularly those positions that may not have been considered eligible in the past. One focus group participant shared the impact of a top leader’s demonstration of support by stating, “I don’t know how comfortable our top leader is on a personal level, but he/she saw to it that all members of his/her staff would get telework agreements in place and that had a big effect. It said 'we're on board.' He/she doesn't give many speeches on it, but this act led by example." This participant's comment testifies to the importance of leaders pushing beyond their personal feelings about telework and leading by example.

In terms of practical concerns, agencies have paid a great amount of attention to the importance of establishing strong technological capabilities to support effective telework programs. Many participants expressed the importance of ensuring that information technology infrastructures are well equipped and discussed the efforts being made in their agencies to ensure appropriate infrastructure. Some agencies described telework drills that allow them to identify any technology-related issues such as user inexperience and technology configuration.

Communication

Technology, training, and leadership support have influenced the success of communication in telework programs. Teleworkers stay connected with their managers and in-office counterparts by use of email, phone, instant message, and voicemail. Several agencies believe that use of these technologies has supported interaction between employees and is therefore a point of success in programs.

Another aspect of communication mentioned as going well in programs is the type of messages that agencies have shared to promote telework. One participant commented, "One thing we did differently was to sell telework to managers as a productivity tool. We said work-life balance is icing on the cake, but the key thing is how to make this a productivity tool and that seemed to help more hesitant managers who thought this was soft stuff only pertaining to women having babies. It made them realize, no, this is about productivity."

Participants also described the kinds of messages communicated within the agencies and their importance to trust, a key competency in successful telework. Participants agreed that it is important to communicate a sense of trust between top leaders, supervisors, and teleworkers. One agency instituted a campaign to promote the importance of trust by posting and distributing flyers with the message "Work plus Trust equals Teletrust" across the agency. Participants agreed that the same amount of trust extended toward office-bound employees to effectively manage their work responsibilities must be extended toward teleworkers. Messages indicating the equitable extension of trust are critical to the establishment of an effective telework program.

Revision of Policies and Procedures

Multiple participants commented that revisions have been made to their agency telework policies within the last year as a result of the Act's requirements. Participants indicated that these modifications have resulted in stronger, more effective agency policies. Procedures to manage notification of eligibility and unscheduled telework also have been implemented by agencies to advance telework programs. Participants addressed the importance of new procedures to increase the effective use of telework across their agencies.

Notable quotes related to what is going well in agencies are shown in the following table.

Table 1: Comments Illustrating Aspects of Successful Telework Programs

Focus Group Question	Notable Quotes
What is going well in your Agency's telework program?	I think the Act helped us because it gave us that legal edge we needed to do some of the things we needed to do. The Act helped us to get a better picture of what's actually going on and to be able to explain telework a bit more. It gave us the spotlight for a little while. I'm worried as we move away from that we'll have to work to be remembered. I don't know how supportive the director general is on a personal level, but her staff all had to get telework agreements and that had a big effect. It said "we're on board." She doesn't give many speeches on it, but led by example. We have about 90% of staff eligible because we went very broad. One thing we did differently is that we tried to sell it to managers as a productivity tool. We said work-life balance is icing on the cake, but the key thing is how to make this a productivity tool and that seemed to help more hesitant managers.

Challenges faced by Agencies

Focus group participants also shared challenges they faced in advancing telework within their agencies. Again, responses reflect both unique challenges and barriers, as well as more common experiences across agencies.

Of the 21 total participants:

- 6 participants (29%) reported that gaining buy-in and manager resistance have been factors that have presented challenges for their telework programs,
- 3 participants (14%) commented that performance management has been challenging,
- 3 participants (14%) noted technology related challenges,
- 4 participants (19%) reported challenges relevant to the equity with which telework has been made available to employees, and
- 3 participants (14%) noted the challenge of limited access to senior level leadership for program partnership and support.

Please see Figure 2 for a graphical representation of the focus group results regarding what challenges agencies faced as they develop telework programs.

Manager Buy-In

While several agencies described success in establishing leadership buy-in, they also described the challenges of gaining manager buy-in. Participants shared that some managers are used to being able to see their staff members physically working in the office (typically described as line-of-sight management) and that they find comfort in this dynamic. Preference for this style of management poses a recognizable challenge to telework.

Others commented that resistant managers are unsure of how to effectively manage employees who are working remotely and, therefore, are reluctant to embrace the numerous possibilities for effective teleworking arrangements. One participant shared what has worked at his/her agency by commenting, “One of the things we did was to obtain support for managers to be included in telework, because initially they weren’t covered. Once we covered them with our policy, they were able to model that behavior.”

Several participants shared that some managers in their agencies have not accepted the fact that there should not be a difference between how teleworkers are managed and how employees who are completely office-bound are managed (as stated in the Act). Highlighting the importance of sharing information, another participant stated, “The managers who do allow it have presented best practices at manager meetings. We did not see a big boost in numbers of telework, but it [manager presentations] did encourage a slightly more receptive perception of telework.”

Performance Management

In a similar vein, successful performance management also proved to be challenging for some of the agencies that were represented in the focus groups. Several participants described the lack of an effective performance management system that focuses on outcomes. Others stated that problems with performance management are fundamentally about education and that managers need to be trained in how a telework program can be applied successfully and seamlessly in accord with performance management standards. Further illustrating the challenge, participants commented that some managers seem unaware of how to help staff members identify aspects of their jobs that can be effectively performed remotely.

Technology

As described earlier, a number of participants noted the importance of effective technology to the success of telework. Several focus group participants also identified technology as a challenge area for advancing telework. Participants shared that teleworkers within their agencies only have access to a Government-issued BlackBerry rather than a laptop. Others commented that there is no available access to shared drives for teleworkers. Participants also shared that there are challenges with the use of personal computers by teleworkers due to security issues. Some participants spoke of budgetary constraints and the consequent impact on the availability of equipment for teleworkers. One participant stated, "This is an austere budget environment, so if you're an agency with less telework already, and less available equipment, it will be a challenge to equip everyone that will be teleworking."

Equity

Multiple participants stated that telework has not been applied in an equitable manner across their agencies. Some participants shared that, although all positions have been deemed eligible within their agency, not all employees are permitted to exercise the option. Others commented that employees in professional positions tend to be able to exercise telework to a greater extent than employees in administrative or support positions in their agencies. One participant shared, "We have pockets where a lot of people telework, and others where they haven't because the supervisor isn't on board or the staff doesn't realize the value of it. We have to find ways to share the practices across the agency."

Access to Leadership

Lastly, a few participants shared that in their roles as telework champions within their agency, an important challenge is posed by limited access to agency top leader(s). One participant commented, "If there was a specific need, we may be able to do something to contact them. But for us getting there is heavy duty." Participants agreed that it would be extremely helpful to improve and increase opportunities for collaboration with their senior leader(s) on telework issues.

Notable quotes addressing challenges to agency telework programs are shown in the following table.

Table 2: Comments Describing Challenges to Telework

Focus Group Question	Notable Quotes
What has been your Agency’s experience in achieving manager buy-in?	One of the things we did was to obtain support for managers to be included in telework, because initially they weren’t covered. Once we covered them with our policy, they were able to model that behavior. When I think of it, all of our managers telework as well. So the fact that they telework encourages their personnel to telework. Great support from the manager level. The managers who do allow it have presented best practices at manager meetings. We did not see a big boost in numbers of teleworkers, but it [manager presentations] did encourage a slightly more receptive perception of telework.
What are the top challenges you have faced in advancing telework in your agency?	This is an austere budget environment, so if you’re an agency with less telework already, and less available equipment, it will be a challenge to equip everyone that will be teleworking. Implementing the Act isn’t a priority for the agency head in the biggest agencies. It doesn’t have that level of urgency. It leaves us with some discretion and opportunities to get things further. There’s more lateral communication than vertical. Not a bad thing. The Law didn’t say how you notify! Standard letters issued to managers to help them understand the intent of the law and what they could use in conversation with employees who wanted to telework was helpful. Having access to standardized language helped managers have a discussion with employees who could not telework based on sensitivity of work, etc. Several grievances on telework too from employees who wanted to telework, but could not because of performance, leave issues, etc. A major challenge in big agencies is that the TMO won’t have access to the agency head. Assistant Secretaries don’t have access. If there was a specific need, we may be able to do something to contact them. But for us getting there is heavy duty. Quite surprising how closed ours was to it, he didn’t want to get involved.

	Another challenge, not having access to other TMOs, etc. during roll-out of the Act. Would be helpful for collaboration (mentioned community of practice). Equity in the application of telework. I see the professional side of the house automatically in. On the support side, oftentimes there is resistance to allowing them. We still have managers that want to see these people all the time. I find it difficult to see how the managers can work at home without any question, but those who support them can't.

Differing Perspectives: TMOs and Coordinators

Figures 1 and 2 show the proportions of TMOs and coordinators that cite various successes and challenges of their telework programs. The chart separates TMOs and coordinators in order to reflect their unique experiences with their telework programs. There is a critical distinction between their perspectives. While TMOs frequently reported successes that are high-level in nature, including achieving support from labor organizations, overcoming agency-wide technology barriers, and gaining support from senior leadership, coordinators reported successes relating to an employee point of view and the implementation process. With respect to challenges faced in telework programs, similar trends emerged among TMOs and coordinators. TMOs cited concerns over broader issues like ensuring equitable access to telework, training, and technology, while coordinators mentioned manager resistance, difficulty in monitoring and measuring performance, and trust between employees and managers.

Specific Program Management Challenges

A specific, but recurring, challenge related to the establishment of the TMO by the Act. Different issues were raised by coordinators and TMOs. For example, one challenge raised by coordinators was that the addition of the TMO position can result in an extra layer of oversight that can make it difficult to complete projects and goals. Some coordinators reported that they do not have the autonomy they once had to manage their agency's telework program and, as a result, cannot follow through with goals and objectives without vetting plans through the TMO. Depending on the ease of access that a coordinator has to his or her TMO, this dynamic can prove challenging and can result in additional time to complete initiatives. Similarly, TMO participants discussed the challenge of not always having the direct and easy access to executive-level leadership necessary to carry through with telework-related goals and objectives.

Some of the coordinators also said they still see themselves as the individuals taking care of the daily operations of their agency's telework program, but that, with the addition of the TMO position, they have lost some of the recognition for ensuring effectiveness of the programs. Other coordinators shared that their relationship with the TMO at their agency is one of true partnership and regular communication and that the loss of recognition has not been an issue.

Responding to the Telework Enhancement Act

The focus group protocol included questions that asked participants to describe their experiences responding to the requirements of the Telework Enhancement Act. Participants were asked how employees in their agency were notified of their eligibility to telework. Multiple participants reported that, at the time of the focus groups, their agencies were not finished with the process of informing employees of their eligibility status. Others had informed employees and described a number of methods and systems such as mass emails, the agency intranet system, all-hands meetings, or an agency newsletter. Still others described a process where supervisors were informed of their staff member’s eligibility in supervisory meetings and then charged to verbally inform their employees directly of their eligibility status.

Participants also were asked how telework is being used, if at all, in emergency preparedness and/or COOP planning in their agency. The majority of participants reported that telework had been folded into their agency’s COOP plan. A couple of participants shared that telework had not been successfully incorporated in the agency COOP plan, but that there are plans to do so in the near future. One participant stated that telework is a part of his/her agency’s COOP plan, but that there has been very little in the way of testing the system or practicing response in the face of a mock emergency. This participant shared that all employees in his/her agency have the tools and are equipped, but that many have not practiced and may not actually be prepared and ready in the face of an actual emergency.

Table 3: Quotes related to Specific Challenges

Focus Group Question	Notable Quotes
What changes, if any, have you made to your telework programs in response to the Telework Enhancement Act?	The problem with telework is that it’s a good idea in search of a purpose early on in the sense that there’s a long list of things we wanted to solve and we called it telework. We can’t get our arms around it. There’s a certain feeling like, the Act passed so we have to get this done from the department’s point of view. But embracing it as a tool is an ongoing process. We began setting goals and developed a training piece. The Act did help to change the mindset; we have a program and it has done well, but the Act caused us to ask: What can we do now? What goals do we need to have? The training component has not been there, but because of the Act we developed our own training. Training should help advance telework, and encourage support from managers. Also, the training should help employees to really understand how to better telework.

Lessons Learned

Many focus group participants reported aspects of strength and success in the ongoing implementation of Federal agency telework programs. Participants also shared areas where change and development has been challenging. Given these experiences, all of the agencies interviewed had “lessons learned” that they believe are important. These are shared here:

Gain Leadership Buy-In

Several participants agreed that gaining buy-in from leadership members at all levels is key to a successful telework program. Comments indicate that gaining leadership support can truly be the catalyst for effective implementation, and buy-in occurs when managers try it for themselves.

Involve Critical Functions

The importance of partnering early and often with union representatives and IT experts within agencies was mentioned as particularly instrumental to the success of telework programs. Involvement of all critical parties and functions will limit the number of unexpected surprises and is important for ensuring the effective collaborations necessary for long-term success.

Institute Reliable Data Collection

Participants also commented that instituting a reliable data collection or tracking procedure is critical to demonstrating telework success and as a tool for long-range planning and managing for program effectiveness. One participant commented, "As a whole, we need to have a better system for tracking telework. Providing data for the OPM Data Call is difficult for many who have to manually track telework participation. Governmentwide, we need to make it easier to collect and report data." Other participants noted that online application systems need to be comprehensive before going live to ensure seamless application. This is another area where partnership with IT and security experts is crucial.

Standardize Eligibility and Participation Criteria

Participants described the importance of standardizing eligibility decisions and notification. Some agencies notify their employees via mass email and/or during new employee orientation, while others prefer managers to send individual emails. Participants agreed that part of increasing trust in the telework process is to make sure that communications and notifications are handled fairly and according to established standards across an agency.

Measure Performance Accurately

Agencies reported facing challenges of performance management in advancing their telework program. Participants stressed the need for performance management systems to measure the outcome of completed tasks and goals. They agreed "managers want to know exactly what teleworkers are working on when out of the office". It is critical for performance management systems to directly link to agency-wide performance plans.

Be Patient

Lastly, several participants emphasized the importance of remaining aware that change takes time and progress with telework requires patience. One participant suggested that one way to address this is to make sure that telework goals and objectives are clear and shared across an agency and that information about progress toward those goals is also shared on an ongoing basis.

Table 4: Participant Recommendation Highlights

Focus Group Question	Notable Quotes
If you had to share one lesson learned from your telework program, what would it be?	Make sure you have a process in place by which to compile data via Web T.A. For people moving to implement telework I would say make sure you have the infrastructure before moving forward. As a whole, we need to have a better system for tracking telework. Providing data for the Call is difficult for many who have to manually track. Governmentwide we need to make it easier to collect and report data.
	A point I'd like to make is that we're in this political environment now where we can never close down. I just hope that when OPM does their briefings for Congress you will remind them that there are many agencies that NEVER close down and have been operating 24/7 for a century. It's not that different without the official telework policy. That message is not getting through to Congress.

Appendix 2: Literature Reviews and Best Practices for Agencies

In response to the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010, two literature reviews were compiled by OPM researchers. They detail best practices for agencies and summarize the state of the literature on telework as a tool for reducing energy use and environmental impacts, alleviating traffic congestion, and increasing job availability.

Telework, Energy, Transportation, and the Environment

Telework can be a useful tool for agencies or organizations that hope to lessen traffic congestion, reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and improve local air quality. Both the public and private sectors have steadily come to promote telework as a means for achieving a variety of goals. Frequently telework is credited with decreasing energy costs, adverse environmental impacts, and emissions of greenhouse gases. This may be a fair assumption, but both the private and public sectors have room to improve methods of measuring and verifying these savings.

The energy impact of telework can be broadly modeled as a function of transportation, home and office space and equipment, and information and communication technology (Horvath, 2010). Below are a few highlights from the growing literature on telework, energy, and the environment.

- The estimated impact of telework on national energy use is small. One study estimated national energy savings of between 0.01 and 0.40 percent in the U.S. and 0.03 to 0.36 percent in Japan (Matthews & Williams, 2005).
- Numerous studies have estimated the impact of telework on vehicle miles traveled, or VMT, which in turn impacts gasoline consumption and traffic congestion. One conservative estimate puts the impact of teleworking at about 1 percent of overall U.S. household VMT (Mokhtarian, 1998). Although this reduction appears small, telework is a much more cost-effective method of reducing congestion than other approaches, such as expanding mass transit (Choo, Mokhtarian, & Salomon, 2005).
- Telework appears to result in significant trip reductions and lower VMT for individual teleworkers. Multiple studies have found that individual employees save in the range of 30 to 50 miles per day or 50 to 80 percent less VMT per year (Lake, 2008).
- Beyond energy use, telework can impact greenhouse gas emissions and office space needs. Studies have estimated a possible savings of 3.5 billion square feet of office space (Romm, 2002) and a ten year savings of 312.4 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions (Fuhr & Pociask, 2011).

Many studies suffer from an inability to account for all the different ways the work environment affects energy use. A few have emerged that attempt to quantify the net impact of telework on energy consumption in the home and office. Below are a few conclusions of these studies:

- When teleworking, employees have lower impacts on energy consumption and air pollution. Non-telework energy use and air pollution costs are likely equal to or higher than those for telework days (Kitou & Horvath, 2008).
- Telework generally reduces air pollutant emissions, but may not reduce all types of emissions equally.<sup>7</sup> Impacts will differ by pollutant, location, heating or cooling season, induced travel, avoided VMT, latent demand, and minimizing space and equipment use when teleworking. Program designers must consider factors such as their local climate, energy mix, transportation patterns, and whether teleworking employees will maintain offices at home and at the central worksite (Kitou & Horvath, Energy-related emissions from telework, 2003).
- Certain forms of transportation may actually increase emissions. Substituting shorter commutes may not reduce energy or emissions because of rebound effects from home energy use. A rebound effect is an unintended increase in energy use due to a behavioral change or new technology that negates the savings from the change. Successful telework programs will encourage the avoidance of polluting forms of transportation, increase commuter vehicle occupancy rates, substitute longer commuters, and increase teleworking frequency (Kitou & Horvath, Transportation choices and air pollution, 2006).

Success Stories in the Private Sector

A quick search of media associated with telework will reveal a number of striking savings estimates from private companies. Companies have reduced energy costs, real estate costs, employee fuel costs, other utility costs, and travel costs. These estimates certainly suggest that telework has great potential for all sectors to save on energy and building costs.

One company has reported savings of $387 million in reduced office space and utility costs due to its telework program between 2002 and 2008. In 2009, another company reported savings of $10.3 million in employee fuel costs and 47,320 metric tons of avoided greenhouse gas emissions. A third company reported saving $550 million in real estate and reduced overhead costs between 1991 and 1997.<sup>8</sup>

Success Stories in the Federal Government

While Federal Government data on telework participation and frequency has been collected over the years, there is still much more to learn about how telework has impacted energy use,

---

<sup>7</sup> Telework reduces the emissions of carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>), mono-nitrogen oxides (NO<sub>x</sub>), particulate matter (PM<sub>10</sub>), and carbon monoxide (CO) but not nitrous oxide (N<sub>2</sub>O) and methane (CH<sub>4</sub>).

<sup>8</sup> As a caution, often these savings figures come from telecommunications companies that may have a vested interest in supporting telework. Many are reported without background on how the estimates were produced and which assumptions were made. Lastly, the units of measurement of the savings differ widely and assumptions – if provided – also differ. This makes comparisons very difficult. Nonetheless, the savings numbers are impressive.

air quality, and emissions within the public sector. Agencies are still adapting to new telework programs and searching for new ways to estimate savings. Yet, a few examples from the Federal Government stand out as models for future research on the potential of telework to reduce energy use and environmental impacts.

- The United States Patent and Trademark office (PTO) is widely considered a leader in telework within the Federal Government. PTO has 7,030 teleworkers (86.52 percent of eligible workers) and 8,125 eligible telework positions (78.35 percent of the agency). Of PTO's teleworkers, 3,739 of them telework 4 to 5 days per week. Employees who telework 4 to 5 days per week relinquish their office space and use a hoteling system when at the Alexandria office. As a result of this unique arrangement, PTO has realized $19.8 million in real estate savings as of August 2011.
- GSA has developed an Excel-based tool for agencies wishing to calculate the break-even point for the costs of telework, purchasing information technology, and real estate savings – the Cost-per-Person Model (Kaczmarczyk, 2008). A GSA commissioned study by Booz Allen Hamilton found that agencies could realize a return on investment of between 225 percent and 1500 percent through a variety of telework program arrangements (General Services Administration, 2006).
- The National Institutes of Health has pursued cost savings from telework through its hoteling initiative. In 2007, the National Science Foundation found that employees saved, on average, 62 hours of commuting time, $1,201 in costs, and 1,751 lbs of emissions in a year of teleworking. This amounted to a 12 percent reduction in National Science Foundation teleworkers' carbon footprint (Telework Exchange, 2008).

Best Program Designs for Achieving Broad Community and Societal Goals

While research still must be improved and expanded, a review of the existing literature shows promise for telework as a tool for addressing energy and environmental challenges. The Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 has reaffirmed the Federal Government's commitment to expanding telework while accurately measuring participation and success. Undoubtedly, this will result in useful information that will help agencies better assess programs and design programs around achieving goals. For some agencies, energy savings and environmental impact may be among the most important program goals. Evidence suggests that agencies seeking to reduce energy costs and emissions should consider the following design elements:

- Maximize hoteling in order to decrease office space. If teleworkers maintain offices at work and if lights and equipment are left turned on at all times, this significantly decreases the potential savings from building costs and utility bills.
- Encourage teleworking for those with longest commutes. Evidence suggests that the most substantial energy savings benefits occur for those with long commutes and in some cases energy use at home could be greater than savings from telework (Kitou & Horvath, 2008).

- Consider cost transfer to employees. Some have suggested that energy savings from telework could merely be transferring utility costs onto employees rather than resulting in a net energy and cost savings overall (Overmeyer, 2011).
- Consider local electricity energy mix. Teleworking could be reducing pollution from one source (the source that powers the office) while increasing it at a dirtier source (the source that powers the home).
- Be flexible with program design. Developing a variety of telework arrangements that can be flexibly applied, as has been done by PTO, could maximize the energy benefit potential of a program.
- Use information and communication technology effectively. Technology plays a critical role in any telework program. Creativity can help maximize the energy benefit. For example, an agency could replace some air travel with teleconferencing or establish telework centers for those uncomfortable with working inside the home.
- Educate teleworkers about how to save energy while teleworking. Educating teleworkers about the arrangements and behaviors that best save energy and reduce pollution could increase the benefits seen from the program. Many workers may have personal desires to further these goals, but may be unsure of the best means to do so.

In order to succeed, telework programs must be thoroughly planned and all transportation and non-transportation trade-offs should be considered. Poor building management, inefficient work arrangements at the office, and low frequency telework schemes can offset any potential energy savings from telework (Kaczmarczyk, 2008). With careful planning, experimentation, and data collection, agencies as well as private companies can realize substantial cost savings while exercising societal responsibility through reducing energy and environmental impacts.

Increasing Job Availability through Telework

As noted previously, telework is promoted and implemented in order to achieve a variety of objectives. While a primary set of objectives includes recruitment, retention, and productivity, telework also has been pursued as a tool for job improvement and for making jobs more available to traditionally underserved populations. These last might include new mothers, employees with disabilities, and aged workers. Underserved populations are particularly strong candidates for telework because they may be hindered by substantial barriers that can be alleviated through using telework as a workplace flexibility (Tremblay, 2003; Feldblum 2008)

There is substantial anecdotal evidence to support the use of telework towards improving job satisfaction and expanding job availability. The available empirical studies, however, tend to focus more on telework as a tool for improving the workplace, rather than on telework's potential to create or expand job opportunities for specific populations. In fact, it is still not clear how telework creates jobs as opposed to making it possible for certain types of people to apply for jobs they would not be able to apply for otherwise. While qualitatively, the range and approximate magnitude of economic impacts such as productivity, wage rates, absenteeism and retention rates has been well researched (mostly through surveys), quantitative estimates or forecasts of specific economic impacts of telework have been sparse (Doherty, Andrey, & Johnson, 2000). This trend is not only reflected in this report, but across the study of telework as a whole (Bailey & Kurland, 2002). Research suggests this measurement challenge may be due to "the lack of formal methods of reviewing or monitoring [telework] program success and the fact that many different 'players' exist in the administration and success of [telework] programs, combined with the wide range of possible organizational, individual and societal impacts in the short- and long-term (Doherty, Andrey, & Johnson, 2000)."

Success Stories in the Private Sector

The private sector provides unique insight into job creation and availability. Literature examining telework in the private sector commonly addresses job creation and job availability through rural development. Many universities, including Washington State University, have identified and encouraged telework as a strategy to revive the rural economy (Washington State University, 2004). Telework can be a very attractive employment option for economically struggling former manufacturing areas, seasonal resort areas, and cold-climate locales. Regions such as the mid-Atlantic and Northeast have lost population and tax base to the high-tech Northwest or warm southern regions of the United States because these areas have been better able to sustain year-round residents. The answer may lie in luring more residents who can work for anyone from anywhere (Fenson & Hill, 2003).

Examples of this revitalization can be found in Colorado ski communities such as Steamboat Springs and Telluride, which have been actively seeking to attract professional teleworkers. By design, these professionals live in the towns and communities (Fenson & Hill, 2003). The towns do not have to create industrial infrastructure or deal with industrial pollutants, and the areas can maintain a highly educated, well-paid populace. Creating these communities requires providing workers with access to a commercial airport, overnight mail services, and computer-based digital switching for telephones. In the past, this was particularly challenging for rural communities (Fenson & Hill, 2003).

Smaller communities outside large metropolitan areas can enjoy enormous benefits from telework. Teleworkers contribute to the revitalization of small towns in outlying areas. A well-placed telework center can allow residents to retain or secure a position with a firm in a metropolitan or inconveniently located area while continuing to work in close proximity to their rural homes. This can enhance retail, service, and food vendor revenue in the smaller struggling community as well (Fenson & Hill, 2003).

The literature suggests that issues associated with increasing telework in rural areas primarily lie in the lack of existing technological infrastructure (OECD, 2001). However, there is little qualitative data that identifies specific challenges to infrastructure provision. Overall, there is a wealth of private-sector information that discusses the benefits of telework, but little that addresses the challenges these companies face in program implementation. More qualitative data is necessary to completely understand the challenges of implementing telework programs in rural areas.

Best Program Designs for Making Jobs More Available through Telework

- Expanding telework participation. In the United States, particularly in the public sector, agencies increasingly offer telework as a flexible workplace option. NASA's Langley Research Center, GSA, and other agencies have all established telework programs to meet their workforce needs, with some promising results. GSA reports that telework has been made available to 92 percent of its 12,205 employees (Feldblum, 2008).
- Legislation can expand opportunities for underrepresented populations. In the public sector, teleworking as a method to create and make jobs available differs in perspective between Federal and state government. In general, the Federal Government shows greater rates of participation in telework than state governments (Telework Research Network, 2011). This is predominantly due to the passage of legislation geared toward creating flexible work environments for specific groups, including disabled, veteran, and aged workers such as the Federal Employees Flexible and Compressed Work Schedules Act, the Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA), New Freedom Initiative, and most recently the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010 (Feldblum 2008; Virginia Commonwealth University, 2005; Eyster, Johnson, & Toder, 2008). The ADA of 1990, enacted over 20 years ago, provides a way for people with disabilities to maintain inclusion in the age of technology by deeming telework a reasonable accommodation. The ability to telework provides potential for employment opportunities for people who may not otherwise access or perform in a traditional work environment due to a disability (Sullenger, 2006).

Just as there are policies and legislation in place to support job availability and job creation at the Federal level, a number of states have also played an integral role in increasing telework in their respective legislatures. According to a report on Workplace Flexibility by the Georgetown Law Center (2006), California, Georgia, Michigan, Utah, and Virginia are a few among many states that have enacted laws to increase opportunities through telework, whether in the form of private/ public partnerships or providing private-sector incentives to companies with telework policies.

- Using telework as a tool to encourage retention of workers nearing or at retirement age. The demographics of the workforce in the United States are rapidly changing as the Baby Boomers reach retirement age. Studies indicate that workers aged 55 to 64 in the American workforce will increase by 48 percent in the next five years, and those aged 65 and older will increase by 40 percent. The Federal workforce has already begun to experience the impact of this shift as a large percentage of Federal employees are eligible to retire, risking a decrease of institutional knowledge and years of expertise. However, similar to the workplace dynamics in New Zealand, retirement-age workers are willing to postpone retirement despite their eligibility, whether by necessity or choice. Regardless of the choice, older employees will want or need employment opportunities that support workplace programs such as flexible schedules and telework (Feldblum, 2008).

In 2006 the Department of Labor published a report suggesting that workplace flexibilities are particularly attractive to older workers and might help ensure their continued services (and thus better knowledge management) especially in an era when many Baby Boomers are now retirement eligible.

- Using telework as a tool to promote employment of highly trained and skilled veteran and employees with disabilities. In 2004, the Department of Labor, Office of Disability Employment Policy, funded three projects to help recently disabled veterans and workers' compensation clients with disabilities to get the training and equipment they need to find and perform teleworking jobs (West & Davis, 2007). Virginia Commonwealth University was funded as one of the projects. Their national employer survey (issued to public and private employers) regarding telework and employees with disabilities revealed that respondents were generally amenable to accommodating employees with disabilities and those with other pressing needs. The findings also revealed that most organizations that allowed employees to telework did so on an ad hoc basis. However, respondents were more likely to allow telework when the employee already had a work history in the organization and the supervisor and coworkers had confidence in the employee's work habits and dedication (West & Davis, 2007).

Appendix 3: Measurement Model

Appendix 4: Detailed Methodology for the Data Call

The data in the 2012 Telework Status Report to Congress were derived from three sources: the 2011 OPM Telework Data Call, the 2011 Employee Viewpoint Survey, and a series of focus groups. Each data source is used to capture the perspective of a stakeholder group instrumental in the success of telework.

The methodology employed for focus groups and the Employee Viewpoint Survey are addressed in the main body of the telework status report and elsewhere (see www.fedview.opm.gov). This expanded method section presented in this appendix considers the Data Call only. Note that the Call represents the agency perspective by collecting both quantitative and qualitative data. Through quantitative data we can estimate, for example, how many employees are teleworking or how many agencies have updated their policies. Quantitative data, however, is limited in its explanatory value and how much contextual perspective it can provide. By also examining qualitative data - such as the open-ended items included on the Call form - we can gather explanatory data and gain a better understanding of the setting in which telework programs are evolving.

2011 OPM Telework Data Call

Various versions of the Call have been issued to Federal agencies since 2001. Under the Act, Executive branch agencies are required to report telework data to OPM for inclusion in the annual status report to Congress. A number of agencies also were required to report telework data at the sub-agency/component level. Participation in the Call is currently the only way for agencies to comply with these data submission requirements.

The Data Call Instrument

The Call provides the agency perspective with questions that address agency telework participation and program implementation and processes (e.g., how employees are deemed eligible, how employees are trained and equipped for telework). The instrument used for the 2010 Data Call was revised in 2011 to ensure alignment with the Telework Enhancement Act (see Appendix 3 for the Word form of the Call included in the online platform). While these changes make some comparisons between previous years' Calls less appropriate, they were necessary in order to accurately gauge the changing nature of Federal telework programs. The purpose of the Data Call is primarily to facilitate tracking and assessment of the impact of policy, rather than trend analysis. Using earlier definitions or inapplicable question wordings clearly would not provide useful information and may actually have caused agencies confusion, with negative consequences for item validity and data reliability.

In order to develop the new definitions and questions included in the updated 2011 Data Call, an Interagency Telework Measurement team was assembled and led by Dr. Kimberly Wells, U.S. Office of Personnel Management. Members included acknowledged leaders and experts in Federal telework, including: Dr. Wendell Joice, U.S. General Services Administration; Danette

Campbell, U.S. Patent and Trademark Office; Pam Budda, U.S. Department of Defense; Aaron Glover, Defense Information Systems Agency; Karen Meyer, United States Navy; Scott Howell, National Aeronautics and Space Administration; Bruce Murray, U.S. Department of Energy; and Dr. Alexis Adams, Christina Heshmatpour, Elnora Wright, and Clint Sidwell, U.S. Office of Personnel Management. These method and subject matter experts reviewed the question wordings, question structures, response alternatives, and instructions to ensure that the Call instrument captured the information needed.

Additionally, two cognitive interviews were conducted with a random sample of TMOs and telework coordinators to test how actual respondents might interpret questions. The interviews also helped to ascertain whether typical respondents had the resources needed to answer the questions. Participants in the interviews were asked to go through the Call and think aloud about how they would respond and how they interpret key terms in the questions. To facilitate, W/L/W staff led the sessions using probing questions and noted participants' responses to the questions. The experts' and respondents' comments were integrated into the final Data Call draft.

Finally, an expert in survey development for the Census gave generously of her time and provided detailed review and comments to the Call. Comments were reviewed by the Interagency Telework Measurement Group and incorporated wherever possible.

The Data Call Respondents

The Act requires OPM to “submit a report addressing telework programs of each executive agency” to Congress. OPM maintains lists of executive branch agencies, and these were consulted and used to form the respondent frame for the Call. Discrepancies across lists were resolved in consultation with agencies. The complete list of agencies and sub-agencies contacted to participate in the Call are shown in Appendix 5.

For each agency, a telework coordinator or TMO was designated and confirmed to enter agency data into an online platform. Access to the platform was gained through a unique username and password assigned to each agency data entry POC. To protect data integrity, only one agency POC was supplied with access information.

The Telework Enhancement Act now requires a specified subset of agencies to report data at the agency and subagency levels. Agencies completed the full Data Call for the agency-level submissions. Agencies required to submit at the subagency level provided data only for telework participation and frequency questions. In total, OPM received responses from 87 agencies and 158 subagencies. A few chose not to respond or submit a full response because of security concerns (e.g., the intelligence community) or because they are not subject to the Act's reporting requirements due to the definition of “Executive agency” included in the Act. Several agencies (e.g., the Smithsonian Institution) are not Executive agencies within the meaning of the statute and thus not required to participate, but several elected to do so nonetheless.

Links to the electronic data entry platform for the Data Call were forwarded to agencies on October 26, 2011, with opportunities to enter data until December 9, 2011. Agency points of contact were invited to participate in the Call via email invitation. To encourage participation, three reminders were sent to data entry POCs and TMOs during the administration period for the Call.

Prior to issuance of the Call, data entry points of contact for agencies, coordinators, and TMOs were invited to attend two sessions designed to brief agencies on the Call's content and timeframe as well as to address any questions. These sessions were an effort to support reporting of valid and reliable data. Although OPM does not have the authority to require attendance at these sessions, every effort was made to encourage participation through multiple reminder emails. The first session (September 2011) focused on reviewing the questions and definitions in the Data Call instrument. The second session (October 2011) walked participants through how to use the online platform, and slides from this session were distributed to all invitees regardless of whether they attended. Between the first and second sessions, Federal telework policy was issued regarding the definition of "telework day." This was clarified in the second training session. However, because OPM cannot mandate attendance it cannot assure that all agencies received this information – although each agency's telework staff also learned of this update through the issuance of policy guidance.

Timeframe

The Call was administered in the fall of 2011, between October 26 and December 9. The decision not to request annualized data addressed several data quality concerns. Due to differing data collection methods, many agencies cannot uniformly report annualized data. Some agencies count telework agreements, some get periodic data feeds from payroll providers, and others simply use informal surveys of managers. The choice to target September and October 2011 was made for several reasons. First, agencies were given until June to satisfy Act requirements, so data collection during the program development months of December through June would not fairly represent telework under the Act. Second, July and August typically are vacation months and any data collected for participation during those months would likely under-report telework activity. Third, with the report due in June 2012, the data collection had to occur at such a time as to allow for data analysis and report compilation. These combined factors left only a short window for which telework data could be collected that would represent telework activity under the Act.

Quality Control

In weekly reminder emails, agency points of contact were encouraged to contact OPM staff members who were available to answer any questions agencies had about the Data Call instrument and online platform. Questions mainly pertained to accessing the website and lost passwords, with very few pertaining to the Call instrument or Call items.

Following the Data Call administration, respondents were given several opportunities to check the accuracy of their responses. First, agencies were provided with a review function built into the online platform that allowed them to view their responses before submitting them. Second, OPM produced and distributed individual reports for each agency data entry point of contact and TMO. Agencies were advised to review and make any necessary corrections to these reports. Responses were updated in the database as needed. A new report was generated and verified by the agency before the agency's data was considered finalized. As a final check, W/L/W staff followed standard analysis protocol and checked the final database for any outstanding anomalies or possible problems in the dataset using descriptive statistics and frequencies. When any discrepancies, outliers, or other anomalous responses were identified, W/L/W individually contacted the agencies to verify and update the data.

Strengths and Weaknesses of the Data Call

The results of the Data Call give insight into agency efforts and status with respect to implementing the Act, how many and how Federal employees telework, summaries of agency goal-setting efforts, and outcomes related to telework. Agency data are quite informative and provide a detailed picture of current Federal telework activities. Program descriptions are particularly valuable and will provide opportunities for interagency sharing of best practices.

Yet, there are some limitations with respect to the participation and frequency findings that should be considered. Agencies rely upon differing methodologies and data sources when gathering participation and frequency data, including time and attendance systems, counting telework agreements, and surveys of employees. Without a standardized Governmentwide data collection system or trained data collection staffs, the final combined telework participation estimates are unlikely to be completely valid or reliable. In particular, many agencies do not have the capability with their current systems to collect all requested data (e.g., situational telework). As a result, the final participation and frequency numbers may underreport telework with consequences for the reliability of the reported results.

When considering these limitations, it is important to note that the participation and frequency questions represent a small portion of the 38 questions in the Data Call instrument. OPM has full confidence in the remaining sections of the Data Call, including those on policy implementation, program goals, emergency planning, information technology, information security, and barriers. In addition, all analyses and coding of qualitative responses were replicated by a second researcher to ensure that all results were accurate and fairly representative of agency perspectives.

Appendix 6: Telework Data Call Instrument

Welcome to the Office of Personnel Management's (OPM's) 2011 Call for Telework Data (Call). Agency participation in this annual Call is a requirement under the Telework Enhancement Act of 2010, Public Law 111-292 (the Act). This form allows systematic data collection. Results will be collated and reported to Congress. Questions have been revised from the previous Call for Telework Data to agree with data elements outlined in the Act and results of this Call will provide a new baseline for future data collections.

The Call will remain open from October 24 – November 30, 2011. During that time, you should complete your data collection and entry according to the following instructions.

REPORTING INSTRUCTIONS (Please Read Carefully)

The questions in the Call ask for information about your program. Please answer every question as completely as possible and respond referring to practices for your current telework program.

Report data according to the specified timeframe

For past data calls, agencies have collected data according to a variety of timeframes; some have collected data at a single point in time and others have averaged data over a calendar year. Combining data from such different sources can lead to inaccuracies in the final combined Federal results. The challenge of achieving an accurate picture of telework Governmentwide is complicated this year by the timeframe of requirements under the Act. Agencies were not required to implement basic aspects of telework programs until early June 2011, and not every agency was able to meet that deadline. To achieve an accurate count of Federal telework participation requires that we collect data according to a time when all programs were more likely to be fully implemented and employees were able to participate. For these reasons, we are asking you to focus your data collection efforts for this Call on the months of September and October 2011. Dates given throughout the data call will specify "as of [date]" (e.g. September 30) with the understanding that data collection should occur for timeframes as near as possible to that time. This will ensure that all final data represent the same timeframe to the extent practicable given the varying data collection methods employed by agencies.

Respond consistently and according to majority practice

When responding to Call items, we ask you to respond thinking not of unique practices within your agency, but customary practice as of September 30, 2011, for the majority of the agency as outlined in the agency policy. For example, when asked to indicate your agency goals for telework, answer according to practice of the majority of the organization for which you are responding.

Try to follow the dates suggested for data collection as closely as possible. However, we recognize that not every agency uses the same approach to data collection, and the timeframe for data availability may be unique to your own agency. Just remain consistent about reporting and, when asked, please describe the timeframe you employed as clearly and completely as possible.

Maintain consistent reporting levels

The Telework Enhancement Act is very specific in directing certain agencies to report telework participation data for each bureau, division, or other major administrative unit of the agency. Agencies must respond to Call questions using this level of detail if they are included in the list shown in section 5312 (see Appendix A for the reproduced list). When responding for a specific administrative unit (e.g., agency, bureau, component, division) please be consistent and answer according to what is customary and documented practice for that level of the organization.

Appendix A

Complete the entire Call according to directions and provided definitions

Please do not skip items when responding to the Call. It is important for us to have the best, most complete information possible. The answers you provide to this Call will help OPM develop telework guidance and resources for the Federal Government and will be shared with Congress.

Unless indicated otherwise, please select only one response to each item. Some items do allow more than one response and will include special instructions such as “Mark all that apply.” Other items also allow for open-ended responses such as description of specific agency practice.

Read the definitions and data terms carefully before responding to the survey.

Report numbers accurately

When a question calls for numbers, be sure to enter whole numbers without decimal points or commas (as examples: 8.2 should be written as 8 and 1,500 should be written as 1500). If you have no data in a particular category, please indicate in spaces provided for explanation (e.g., “other”). However, when a required question calls for numbers, you must enter a number. For example, if you do not have any routine teleworkers that work 3 or more days during a two week period, report 0 (zero) in the answer space.

Please complete and submit the Call by the deadline

The site to enter data will be open as of October 24, 2011. All responses must be received by COB November 30, 2011. Failure to submit your data by this date will mean that your agency will not be included in the annual telework report to Congress. Keep in mind that the Telework Enhancement Act requires that each Executive agency submit telework data to OPM for inclusion in the June 2012 report and subsequent annual reports to Congress. Currently, responding to this data call is your only opportunity to ensure that your agency has met the reporting requirements in the Act.

If you have concerns or questions about this Call for data, please contact us at WorkLifeSurvey@opm.gov.

- Definitions and Data Terms

DEFINITIONS AND DATA TERMS

The Telework Enhancement Act provides the official Governmentwide definitions for telework. The version below considers practice and operationalizes the Act definition. Please respond to the Call using this definition:

Telework is a work arrangement that allows an employee to perform work, during any part of regular, paid hours, at an approved alternative worksite (e.g., home, telework center). This definition of telework includes what is generally referred to as remote work but does not include any part of work done while on official travel or mobile work. See the following clarifications on remote and mobile work.

Include in reported counts of telework:

- REMOTE: (1) A work arrangement in which the employee resides and works at a location beyond the local commuting area of the employing organization's worksite. (2) A full-time telework arrangement.

Do not include in reported counts of telework:

- MOBILE: (1) Work which is characterized by routine and regular travel to conduct work in customer or other worksites as opposed to a single authorized alternative worksite. Examples include site audits, site inspections, investigations, property management, and work performed while commuting, traveling between worksites, or on Temporary Duty (TDY).

Employee

For the purposes of this data collection, the term employee refers to Federal civilian employees. Please exclude military personnel and contractors. If possible, include full-time, part-time, and intermittent employees in totals.

Eligibility to Participate in Telework

The Telework Enhancement Act refers to telework "eligibility" and "participation." For purposes of this survey we have combined eligibility and participation into a single factor: eligibility to participate in telework. When responding to Call questions use the following definition:

An employee is eligible to participate in telework if all of the following parameters are true:

- The employee has not been officially disciplined for being absent without permission for more than 5 days in any calendar year.
- The employee has not been officially disciplined for violations of subpart G of the Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch for viewing, downloading, or exchanging pornography, including child pornography, on a Federal Government computer or while performing official Federal Government duties
- Teleworking does not diminish the employee's performance or agency operations.
- For employees' participating in the telework program, participation and performance complies with the requirements and expectations of his/her telework agreement.
- The employee's official duties do not require on a FULL daily basis (ALL DAY, every work day):
  - direct handling of secure materials determined to be inappropriate for telework by the agency head; or
  - on-site activity that cannot be handled remotely or at an alternate worksite.
- The employee and/or the employee's position are not disqualified based on additional criteria established by the organization.

Types of Telework

For purposes of this data collection, there are two types of telework. Questions in the Call refer to both forms:

1. Routine: telework that occurs as part of an ongoing, regular schedule, and
2. Situational: telework that is approved on a case-by-case basis, where the hours worked were not part of a previously approved, ongoing and regular telework schedule.

Examples of situational telework include telework as a result of special work assignments or doctor appointment. Situational telework is sometimes also referred to as episodic, intermittent, unscheduled or ad-hoc telework.

Non-numerical and other responses received regarding participation goals

Agency	Other responses
Central Intelligence Agency	Due to the classified nature of our mission, most employees are not eligible to telework therefore telework agreements are approved on a case by case basis.
Department of Defense	Based on the size and diversity of the Department, we have selected a very conservative goal until we have a baseline of telework accomplished in 2012 once the requirements of the Act are fully implemented. A more ambitious goal is feasible in 2013 with a solid data baseline.
Department of Justice	Additionally, goals are to promote telework from the Attorney General level. Improve technology to ensure telework capability. Encourage telework buy in from leadership. Develop surveys to detect deficiencies.
Department of Veterans Affairs	We are working to establish 2012 goals based on current data.
Farm Credit Administration	100% of all FCA employees complete telework agreements and are eligible to telework with supervisory approval. Approximately 42% of employees participate in the telework program in a routine or situational manner.
Federal Election Commission	Develop measures on how to assess cost savings of Telework program.
Federal Energy Regulatory Commission	Increase telework participation without diminishing overall Commission performance.
Federal Maritime Commission	The FMC is a small agency and is comfortable with its current level of 54% of employees having a telework agreement in place.
Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission	The agency is currently working on our performance goals, including telework.
General Services Administration	GSA determined that organizations would be more aggressive in implementing telework without the imposition of specific participation goals.

Agency	Other responses
Millennium Challenge Corporation	100% of all employees should have at least a situational telework agreement in place.
National Council on Disability	NCD's goal for increasing telework participation is to utilize telework options to improve the recruitment and retention of high-quality employees through enhancements to the employees' quality of life and increase efforts to employ and accommodate people with disabilities, including employees who have temporary or continuing health problems, or who might otherwise have to retire on disability.
National Mediation Board	All eligible employees are allowed to telework
National Science Foundation	Currently 70% of NSF employees have approved telework agreements on file. Over the next year, we expect an increase to at least 75%. Our lack of a system for tracking actual days teleworked has prevented us from establishing a solid baseline from which to establish an aggressive goal for employees "teleworking". Steps that we are taking to reach this goal, include but are not limited to, the following: 1) Hiring a permanent Telework Managing Officer (TMO), 2) Implementing an electronic system for the development, approval, and tracking of telework agreements, 3) Implementing WebTA (a new time and attendance system) which will allow us to track actual telework days by individual and by division and directorates within the agency; and 4) Completing an ongoing telework pilot that will provide information on the successes and challenges of telework at NSF. The TMO will then be able to establish a baseline and work with senior management to set goals for employees teleworking at NSF. In addition, efforts have already begun for reaching out to division and directorate employees and managers on topics surrounding telework through presentations, brown bags, and news articles to all staff. We expect as a result of ongoing outreach and the full-time attention of the TMO we will increase our ability to move forward with a robust telework

	program.
Nuclear Waste Technical Review Board	100% of our employees already are able or regularly telework.
Office of Management and Budget (EOP)	We have not set a telework participation goal for 2012 as our 2011 pilot is still underway. We plan to review our data to establish a baseline and set a goal. During this pilot period, surveys were distributed to staff and managers to obtain feedback on the telework policy and implementation process. Three focus groups were formed to review the data, identify best practices and solutions and recommend policy changes to senior leadership.
Peace Corps	The Agency has identified barriers to telework such as culture, manager support, work conditions, technology and security issues and is implementing strategies to address the barriers. In the second quarter of 2012, we will, on the basis of our barrier analysis, set goals to be accomplished by the end of the fiscal year,
Small Business Administration	The goal is for 100% of all eligible employees to have an ad-hoc, if not any other, agreement in place.
Tennessee Valley Authority	Ensuring all teleworkers have current agreements in place

The telework participation number for NSF is based on telework agreements for NSF teleworkers that have a set telework schedule of one day per week or more. NSF believes the actual number of staff teleworking was higher. In April of 2012 NSF is implementing a new time and attendance system that will allow it to report actual telework frequency for September 2012.

Notes: Dashes indicate that data is not available. In most cases, this reflects the fact that the agency simply did not have the ability to track that particular piece of data at the time of the Data Call. For percentages calculated by OPM from agency data, the dashes indicate that the unavailability of a piece of information prevented OPM from providing the percentage.

Sub-agency data will not typically sum up to the totals found in the agency frequency data tables. This is because in most cases the list of sub-agencies does not necessarily encompass the entire organization, thus this does not reflect an error.

The Department of Health and Human Services did not provide frequency data by sub-agency during the reporting period.

Pilot Program 8.9

Pilot Program
Number: 8.9

Title: Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program

Contact: Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division, Human Resources Services Office

Program
Statement: The AOC's Remote Work Program authorizes employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director.

Contents:

- (A) Purpose of Remote Work Program
- (B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work
  - (1) Applicability
  - (2) Request and Approval Process
  - (3) Remote Work Schedules
  - (4) Remote Work Log
- (C) Ad Hoc Remote Work
- (D) The Home Office
  - (1) Work Environment
  - (2) Office Equipment
  - (3) Information Security
  - (4) Health and Safety
- (E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities
- (F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this pilot program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this pilot program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This pilot program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this pilot program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this pilot program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work Pilot Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work

(1) Applicability

Only non-supervisory AOC employees (regular or temporary, full-time or part-time, exempt or non-exempt) may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable pilot program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work
How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously.

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the pilot program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee's review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees (excluding supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this pilot program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on a monthly report that will be submitted to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee's primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this pilot program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this pilot program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the Remote Work Application form (Attachment II) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Executive Summary

The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC), Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) has prepared this six-month interim status report on the progress of Judicial Council Directive 26, which states that:

...the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC adheres to its telecommuting policy consistently and identifies and corrects all existing deviations and violations of the existing policy.

This report includes a six-month update of the pilot telecommuting program. It includes information on how the program was implemented, details on employee usage, how accountability has been monitored, and next steps in the process.

Previous Council Action

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council directed the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the AOC consistently adhered to its existing telecommuting (working remotely) policy. The council also requested that the Administrative Director identify and correct all existing deviations from and violations of the existing policy.

On December 14, 2012, the council directed the Administrative Director to review Policy 8.9 (attachment 1), Working Remotely (Telecommuting), of the AOC Personnel and Policies Procedures Manual and provide the council with a report proposing any recommendations and amendments to the policy. The council also directed the Administrative Director to consider and report on alternatives—including whether this policy should remain in force—and return with a report and recommendations for the council’s February 2013 meeting.

During the February 2013 meeting, the Administrative Director requested, in his report, that the Judicial Council consider and approve one of the following options:

1. Eliminate all forms of telecommuting;
2. Eliminate regular telecommuting and only allow for limited ad hoc telecommuting under special circumstances; or
3. Permit telecommuting by approving a restructured and more restrictive telecommute policy, including controls for approving, monitoring, and, if necessary, rescinding participation.

The Judicial Council approved a twelve-month pilot of the proposed amended Policy 8.9 (attachment 2), Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Pilot Program, authorizing employees to work from home only when doing so is consistent with business needs and the employee’s job functions, as authorized by the Administrative Director. Included with the new pilot program, the council approved the use of ad hoc remote work arrangements, limited to no more than two workdays per month, when unknown business or personal needs arise.

The council directed that an interim report be provided to the Executive and Planning Committee (E&P) following six months of implementation, and a full report be presented to the Judicial Council at the completion of the one-year pilot program.

Participant Data – Past and Present

The original policy allowed for up to eight days per month of telecommuting, and provided each office leader with discretion regarding any exceptions to the policy. In 2012, 98 employees (including supervisors and managers) participated in the Working Remotely (Telecommuting) Program, representing 454 remote working days per month. The telecommuting benefit for supervisors and managers was eliminated when the amended pilot program was implemented in March 2013.

Currently, under the pilot telecommute program, there are 69 individuals who have been approved to telecommute on a one-day-per-week basis, representing 276 remote workdays per month. This represents a 30 percent decrease in telecommute approvals and about a 40 percent decrease in the number of telecommute days utilized per month utilizing the criteria established by the Administrative Director.

Methodology and Process

Pilot Remote Work (Telecommute) Program Application Process

1. A transitional period was granted by the Administrative Director through May 31, 2013, to allow for an application period and to allow individuals on prior telecommute schedules time to adjust to the new policy parameters;
2. Employees were asked to submit applications to a central email account (pilot.telecommute@jud.ca.gov) for tracking and monitoring by HRSO;
3. The HRSO reviewed applications and submitted to the Administrative Director for final review and approval; and
4. If approved, employees began their one-day-per-week telecommute after June 3, 2013, on a date approved by their supervisors. Employees were also required to submit weekly logs describing work performed during their telecommute days.

All other aspects of the pilot program, such as ad hoc telecommuting, became effective on March 1, 2013.

Ad hoc Telecommute Program

The ad hoc telecommute program is a separate component of the pilot program, offering employees the ability to work remotely no more than two days per month when extenuating circumstances arise. The ad hoc telecommute program is only available to individuals who do not participate in the regular pilot telecommute program.

Special Circumstances Affecting Employees' Commutes

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the BART Strike

In early July 2013, a special circumstance occurred when the employees of the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) went on strike, which resulted in a shutdown of one of the main public transportation services utilized by staff to commute to and from the San Francisco office. During this period, the AOC Executive Office authorized individuals who were directly impacted by the strike to ad hoc telecommute on the first two days of the BART closure.

This exception also applied to individuals who participated in the regular pilot telecommute program; however, no individual employee was allowed to telecommute more than two days during this particular week. Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special BART telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the Bay Bridge Closure

In early September 2013, a special circumstance occurred when the Bay Bridge was closed due to the road changes related to the opening of the new eastern span of the bridge. The closure was expected to create heavy traffic and congested public transit. During this period, the AOC Executive Office provided individuals with options that would meet the work needs of the AOC while trying to alleviate the commute during the period of the bridge closure.

The options provided during the bridge closure included: 1) the ability to allow up to two ad hoc telecommute days for those individuals not participating in the pilot program; 2) the ability to shift the regular telecommute day to a day impacted by the bridge closure (for those participating in the pilot program); 3) the ability to work a flexible work schedule to avoid heavy commute periods; or 4) the ability to utilize available accruals to take time off during impacted days.

Supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special Bridge Closure telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Ad hoc Telecommuting Related to the Second BART Strike

In late October 2013, BART employees participated in a second strike, which, once again, resulted in a shutdown of one of the main public transportation services utilized by staff to commute to and from the San Francisco office. This closure of the public transportation system was anticipated and the AOC Executive Office authorized the following options to ease the commute burden on employees: 1) the use of the two ad hoc telecommute days, as allowed by policy to those individuals who were not participating in the pilot telecommute program; 2) allow those on the pilot telecommute program to shift their one telecommute day within that same week; 3) allow employees to adopt a flexible work schedule as permitted by business needs and supervisor approval; or 4) allow employees to use available accrued leave as permitted by business need and supervisor approval.

During the second BART strike, supervisors and managers were tasked with ensuring that any individuals who worked remotely during these days had significant assignments to cover the full duration of the remote work period. Special BART telecommute logs were collected to account for the remote work time and to record the types of duties performed while working remotely.

Use of Work Logs

Individuals who participate in the pilot program are required to submit a weekly remote work log to the supervisor of the unit. This log includes a listing of the duties/tasks completed during the designated remote workday.

Sample Duties and Tasks Reported on Work Logs

Work logs have been collected from participants of the pilot program and those who worked remotely on an ad hoc basis during any of the special circumstances previously listed. The most common remote work duties or tasks reported included:

- Reviewing documents, researching (project based, legal research and data collection), analyzing data;
- Preparing for projects (presentations, timeline development, and curriculum development);
- Responding to communications (email and phone);
- Participating in conference calls; and
- Writing and editing reports.

Duties specific to a particular office were also listed, but were less common on the logs. The HRSO reviews the logs regularly and contacts individual supervisors with any questions or concerns regarding the content of the log or the duties/tasks performed. Supervisors and managers who had participants in either the pilot program or the ad hoc program were satisfied with both the quality and quantity of work provided during the remote work periods.

Policy and Cost Implications

It was determined that part-time employees, employees acting in a senior-level or lead capacity, and employees requiring direct supervision were not allowed to participate in pilot telecommute program, as the essential duties of their positions required their presence at the workplace.

Part-time Employees

For employees on a part-time schedule—as they are already unavailable one to three days per week—any additional time out of the workplace would further affect productivity.

Employees Acting in a Senior-level or Lead Capacity

Employees in a senior-level role—which involves regularly interacting with staff, sharing their knowledge and skills, and providing guidance—are critical to the daily operations of the AOC. Working remotely inhibits the ability of a person in this role to provide onsite guidance and face-to-face interaction.

Employees Requiring Direct Supervision

Most classifications identify the amount of supervision expected during the workday. If the phrase “works under direct supervision” is listed in an employee’s job classification, then that employee is expected to be present in the workplace to provide customer support under the guidance of the lead or supervisor. Additionally, if an employee’s regular presence in the workplace is integral to the functions of the unit, it is likely that the application will be denied by the Administrative Director.

Summary of Findings

- In the initial application period (March 1, 2013, through March 29, 2013) there were 105 applications received from employees, with a desire to telecommute one day per week.
- Upon review of those applications, the Administrative Director made certain policy determinations, as outlined in the Policy and Cost Implications section above, resulting in the approval of 63 of the applications for participation in the program and the denial of 42.
- As a result of feedback from the Management Council, the Administrative Director directed the HRSO to provide all offices with an updated application process—incorporating the policy determinations that would be utilized moving forward. Application packets were sent to all members of the Management Council on May 29, 2013.
- All new and resubmitted applications included a detailed job description listing the job duties that could be effectively performed remotely.

As a result of this amended process, one new application was submitted and five employees<sup>1</sup> resubmitted their applications to telecommute. Based on the application materials, recommendations from the supervisor, office leader and the HRSO, all six individuals were approved by the Administrative Director for one day per week telecommuting, in accordance with the pilot program parameters. These additional approvals resulted in a total of 106 applicants, 69 approvals and 37 denials.

Pilot Remote Work (Telecommute) Program Results

As of September 3, 2013, 69 individuals have been approved to telecommute through the pilot program, representing approximately 9.6 percent of current AOC staff. The chart below illustrates the number of participants from the various AOC offices:

Next Steps

The HRSO will continue to review the telecommute logs to monitor appropriate quantities of work and the types of duties/tasks performed.

The HRSO will continue to review and make recommendations to the Administrative Director for any new applications requesting to participate in the pilot program.

Regular reports will be provided to the Administrative Director on the number of employees participating in the program, both on the Remote Work (Telecommute) Program and the Ad Hoc Telecommute Program.

Future reports will include any special circumstances affecting employees' commutes.

Summary of Changes to Policy 8.9

The following chart summarizes revisions to Policy 8.9 and describes the controls and tracking mechanisms used in the more restrictive regular and ad hoc pilot programs.

	Regular Pilot Telecommute Program	Ad Hoc Telecommute Program
Defined eligibility requirements.	The AOC Executive Office restricted application of the program in comparison with the previous program and determined that part-time employees, employees acting in a senior-level or lead capacity, and employees requiring general supervision would not be allowed to participate in the pilot telecommute program as the essential duties of their positions required their presence at the workplace.	The AOC Human Resources Services Office reviewed requests to ensure that employees who were participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program were not, at the same time, working from home on an “ad hoc” basis.
Lower utilization rates.	With the implementation of the regular pilot policy, the AOC experienced a 33 percent decrease in telecommute participants from 2012 and an approximate 42 percent decrease in the number of telecommute days utilized per month.	The previous ad hoc program was not measured. In the current pilot program, the average ad hoc telecommute usage within the entire AOC has averaged approximately 36 days per month, representing less than one percent of staff work time spent ad hoc telecommuting. Well more than half of that usage occurred during three disruptive events in the Bay Area.
Centralized application and review process allowed for consistent application of the policy throughout the AOC.	In the previous policy, division directors were given the authority to approve or deny participation. Under the new pilot program, the decision is made by the Administrative Director.  The AOC received 105 applications for the regular pilot program. Upon review, the Administrative Director made certain policy determinations, resulting in only 65 employees currently participating in the program.	New to the pilot program, each office leader reviewed and approved each request for ad hoc telecommuting.

Attachment E:

Arming managers and supervisors with the tools necessary to address special circumstances.		During special circumstances in the past, division directors had the discretion to offer employees various options, which contributed to inconsistencies. When special circumstances occurred during the pilot period that required exceptional considerations, the Executive Office further defined consistent parameters agency wide of the ad hoc program to allow for flexibility while operating within the parameters of the policy.
Tracking and monitoring.	Participants submit work logs to their supervisors for review on a monthly basis. Work logs may be audited at any time to ensure that the duties performed while telecommuting are appropriate and sufficient for a full day's work.	The centralized review process allowed tracking of the utilization of the ad hoc remote work days. The AOC Human Resources Services Office examined patterns of usage and potential usage by employees who were not qualified to ad hoc telecommute.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment(A) Purpose of Remote Work Program

When consistent with business needs and the employee's job functions, the AOC provides employees with a remote work option. Employees participate in the remote work program when, on a periodic basis, during their scheduled work hours, they perform their usual job duties from home. The terms "working remotely", "work remotely", and "remote worker" as used in this ~~pilot~~ program refer to the performance of usual job duties at home. Home locations for purposes of this ~~pilot~~ program shall be in the state of California.

Suitability to participate in the remote work program is based, in part, on an employee's job classification and the nature of the work to be performed by the employee. Those factors alone may compel disapproval of an application to participate in the remote work program.

The AOC recognizes the potential organizational and personal benefits available through a carefully planned and managed remote work program. Both the state and federal government have recognized the positive impacts of remote work programs that include reductions in air pollution, traffic congestion and the costs of highway commuting. Additionally remote working can provide employees with more flexibility in their schedules resulting in increased productivity and employee morale.

This ~~pilot~~ program covers two types of remote work options:

- (1) Regularly scheduled (which allows employees to work from home on a regular, ongoing basis, as described in Section (B) (3) of this ~~pilot~~ program), and
- (2) "Ad hoc" (occasional, one-time approval to work from home, as described in Section (C) of this ~~pilot~~ program).

Employees working in more than one location, other than the home, due to work-related travel, and/or working from multiple AOC offices or court locations, are considered to be working in the office. This Remote Work ~~Pilot~~ Program does not apply to that activity.

Requests to work from home as a reasonable accommodation for a disability will be evaluated consistent with applicable law. Such requests should be directed to the employee's supervisor and approved by the Human Resources Services Office (HR), Integrated Disability Management Unit.

(B) Regularly Scheduled Remote Work

(1) Applicability

Only ~~non-supervisory full-time~~ AOC employees (regular or temporary, ~~full-time or part-time~~, exempt or non-exempt) not serving in a supervisory or lead capacity or whose job description does not require general supervision may apply to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis.

(2) Request and Approval Process

An employee may initiate a request to participate in the remote work program on a regularly scheduled basis by submitting a completed Remote Worker Self-Assessment and Remote Work Application to his or her supervisor. The supervisor will review the request and make a recommendation to the office leadership. Office leadership will submit the request with a recommendation to Human Resources. Human Resources will review the request to ensure that the application meets all applicable ~~pilot~~ program criteria. HR will submit the request with a recommendation to the Executive Office for consideration. Approval of a remote work arrangement is at the discretion of the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 1 – Office Leadership Review

A request to participate in the remote work program must be reviewed by the employee's office leadership, who will determine if the employee, while working from home, can perform all of the duties and responsibilities of the position in a manner that meets the needs of the organization. When considering a request to work from home, all of the following factors will be considered:

- Nature of Work
The type of work performed by the employee.
- Quantity of work

How much work can get done from home?

- Quality of work
How well can the work be completed from home?
- Timeliness
Can timelines be met when working from home?
- Ability to handle multiple priorities
Is it possible to successfully multitask when working from home?

Employees must also demonstrate suitability of the proposed home work environment.

Employees with performance, attendance, or other work-related deficiencies, or whose jobs by their nature are not suitable for remote work, will not be approved for a remote work arrangement.

Office leaders are expected to review each application with the expectation that services not be impacted as a result of telecommuting. As such, each office must strive to achieve a balance in ensuring that employees are readily available at all times.

Step 2 – Human Resources Services Office Review

Completed remote work applications reviewed by the originating office's leadership shall be submitted to HR for additional review.

HR will review applications to ensure that signatures have been obtained; the agreement is consistent with the parameters of AOC policies and procedures; and the employee's duties and responsibilities align to the five factors noted previously. HR will also consider the following when reviewing applications:

- Requested telecommute day
What is the requested telecommute day and are there coworkers telecommuting?
- Current division and unit balance
How many pilot program participants does the office currently have in relation to office and unit totals?
- Ability to handle scheduled and unexpected leaves
Will the office have coverage in times of scheduled days off or unexpected absences?
- Performance Improvement Plan (PIP)
Is the employee currently on a PIP? Has the employee had past performance issues?

Any remote work agreement that is not complete, does not have all required signatures, or is outside of the scope of the ~~pilot~~ program will be returned to the originating office for review. Remote work schedules may not begin until the remote work agreement has been approved by the Administrative Director or designee.

Step 3 – Administrative Director or designee’s review

The Administrative Director or designee will review the remote work agreement and determine whether to approve or deny. If the remote work agreement is approved, HR will notify the Office Leadership of the approval and a start date can be coordinated with the employee.

(3) Remote Work Schedules

Employees Full-time employees (excluding leads, supervisors, managers, assistant directors, and directors) may be approved to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis as follows:

- During the first 12 months of employment, employees are not eligible to participate in the remote work program.
- After 12 months of employment, employees are eligible to request to work from home up to a maximum of one day per week in any given week.

If approved, the remote work schedule applicable to a particular employee will be set by the supervisor before remote working begins. Remote workers must be available during the standard workday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday (Hours of Work, policy 4.4(A)), or alternative schedule as approved by their supervisor, to the same extent as if working in the office. The remote work schedule may be modified, with supervisor approval, as needed:

- The remote work assignment may be suspended or terminated at any time, for any reason at the discretion of the office leadership. If a remote work assignment is suspended or terminated the HR work coordinator must be notified immediately.
- If an employee is needed in the office on a regularly scheduled remote work day, the employee must forgo the remote work day. Employees cannot “make up” missed remote work days.
- Remote workers must request approval for time off in the same manner as if not working from home.
- With prior approval, remote workers may attend medical, dental, and business appointments on remote work days.
- For non-exempt employees, any overtime work must be authorized in advance and in writing (Hours of Work, policy 4.4\(C\)\(1\)).

(4) Remote Work Log

AOC employees approved for a regular remote work schedule must complete a remote work log for each day that they work from home. The remote work log must be provided regularly to the supervisor for review of work progress during remote work days. Employees who do not satisfactorily complete a remote work log or their assignments during remote work days may have their remote work assignment suspended or terminated at the discretion of the office leadership.

(C) Ad Hoc Remote Work

An employee of the AOC (including part-time employees, leads, managers and supervisors) may alternatively be approved to work from home on an “ad hoc” basis (i.e., not on a regular basis), which may arise due to special projects, extenuating circumstances such as the demand for expedited work products, or other business or personal needs. The employee’s office leader may approve ad hoc work from home on a case-by-case basis. Each office will submit a monthly report of ad hoc remote work to the HR remote work coordinator. Quarterly reports will be submitted to the Administrative Director. Approval to work remotely on an ad hoc basis does not require submission of the forms referenced in Section (B)(2) of this ~~pilot~~ program and does not confer eligibility to work from home on a regularly scheduled basis.

~~“Ad hoc” remote work occurrences are limited to two days per month in any given month. intended to provide an ability to work remotely during special circumstance situations and are not meant to supplant the remote working program. “Ad Hoc” remote work situations are limited to a maximum of two days per month in any given month. Quarterly reports are provided to the Executive Office for review. Unusually high utilization or patterns of usage by an office or an individual may result in suspension of the “Ad Hoc” opportunity at the discretion of the Administrative Director.~~

Employees who are participating in the regularly scheduled remote work program may not, at the same time, work from home on an “ad hoc” basis.

The supervisor or manager recommends approval of the ad hoc remote working-request and submits to his or her office leadership. Office leadership ~~may approve the ad hoc remote work and record the usage on~~ shall submit a monthly usage report ~~that will be submitted~~ to HR. HR will collect that data and provide quarterly utilization reports to the Administrative Director.

(D) The Home Office

(1) Work Environment

Remote workers are responsible for maintaining a safe and productive work environment. Dependent care arrangements must be made so as not to interfere with work. Personal disruptions must be limited to the same extent as when working in the employee’s primary work location.

(2) Office Equipment

The AOC will provide a laptop, subject to availability, for purposes of working from home. Maintenance, repair, and replacement of AOC-owned equipment issued to remote workers is the responsibility of the AOC. The remote worker, however, must provide adequate care and protection of the equipment. \(Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8\(B\)\). In case of equipment malfunction, the remote worker must notify his or her supervisor immediately. Expenses for purchases, supplies, and repairs to personal equipment will not be reimbursed. Remote workers must restrict access to AOC-provided office equipment from family members and others.

The remote worker must also observe the following:

- The remote worker is responsible to provide appropriate Internet connectivity in order to perform work duties. DSL or cable-based service is normally acceptable for this purpose.
- AOC-issued laptops must be brought into the office a minimum of once per month, and as requested, to assure the necessary technology and security updates are installed. The Information Technology Services Office does not provide technology support for use of personal equipment for working from home.
- Any software installed on AOC-issued laptops remains the property of the AOC and is subject to all applicable copyright laws and rules and regulations on the use or reproduction of software.
- Upon termination of a remote work assignment or employment, or when requested by the supervisor, the employee must return all AOC property, including software.

Computer support for remote workers is available from the Information Technology Services Office Helpdesk during the hours of 7:30 a.m. – 6:00 p.m. Remote workers may request assistance by submitting an on-line service request to the AOC Service Portal, or contacting the HelpDesk at (415) 865-4080 or helpdesk@jud.ca.gov.

(3) Information Security

Network and information security are important considerations when working from home. Remote workers are expected to maintain the security, privacy, and confidentiality of information when working at the home work site or transporting data to and from work sites, including:

- Remote workers must follow all organizational data retention, backup and security procedures.
- Remote workers must restrict access to confidential and personal information from family members and others. (Use of AOC Property, policy 8.8(D)).
- Access-restricted material and data must remain secured, and cannot be taken out of the official work location without supervisory approval.

Some AOC applications will be restricted to on-site access for security reasons. Other data may be unavailable to remote workers for technical reasons. For example, remote access to network drives is only available to employees approved and provided resources for access.

Remote workers must report any potential breach of AOC information security immediately to the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

(4) Health and Safety

Remote workers are responsible for ensuring that their home offices comply with health and safety requirements. The AOC may decline an employee's request to work from home or may terminate a remote work assignment based on safety considerations. The home office may be inspected by the AOC, by appointment, for compliance with health and safety requirements.

If an employee incurs a work-related injury while working from home, workers' compensation law and rules apply. Consistent with AOC's Workers' Compensation Insurance, policy 6.6, employees must immediately notify their supervisor, or if their supervisor is not immediately available, the Human Resources Services Office, Integrated Disability Management Unit, of any work-related injury and complete all required documents.

(E) Other Employee Rights and Responsibilities

Remote workers maintain the rights and responsibilities set forth in AOC policies and procedures to the same extent as if not working remotely. In particular, employees must comply with Technology Use, policy 8.6 and AOC Computer Use Best Practices.

(F) Termination and Renewal of Remote Work Assignment

Participation in the remote work program is voluntary and it is a privilege. Either the employee or the AOC may terminate participation in the remote work program at any time, for any reason or no reason at all. Failure to abide by the policies and procedures set forth in this ~~pilot~~ program may result in immediate termination of an employee's remote work assignment. Any suspension or termination of a remote work assignment must be immediately reported to HR.

It shall be the continuing duty of the office leadership in each office, in which one or more employees telecommute, to assess the performance of each such employee by adhering to the terms, conditions, and standards of this ~~pilot~~ program.

Approval to participate in the remote work program is only valid for the fiscal year in which it is approved. Remote Work Applications must be renewed and approved by the Administrative Director or designee each fiscal year, on or before June 30, as well as when there is a change in the remote worker's or supervisor's position, or any other change that may impact the remote work arrangement. Remote workers who wish to continue their current remote work arrangement without modification are only required to complete the ~~Remote Work Application form (Attachment H)~~ Remote Work Application form \(Attachment I\) to request renewal. A remote work arrangement must not be continued when it does not meet the business needs or help accomplish the mission of the AOC.

All regularly scheduled remote work arrangements, including renewals, must be approved by the Administrative Director or designee prior to commencement of the remote work schedule. Approval to participate in the remote work program is based on specific criteria considered by the employee's office leadership and the Human Resources Services Office, on a case-by-case basis. As circumstances may change over time, employees previously participating in the remote work program are not assured of a remote work assignment when returning from a leave of absence or after a job transfer.

Council Directive 27

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that, with an appropriate individual employee performance planning and appraisal system in place, the AOC utilizes the flexibility provided by its at-will employment policy to address employee performance issues. The AOC's at-will employment policy provides management with maximum hiring and firing flexibility, and should be exercised when appropriate.

SEC Recommendation 6-4

With an appropriate individual employee performance planning and appraisal system in place, the AOC must utilize the flexibility provided by its at-will employment policy to address serious employee performance issues.

This directive resulted in the development and implementation of Performance Management program organization-wide in July of 2013 which includes policy for utilizing performance improvement plans to address employee performance that may ultimately result in the use of the council's at-will employment policy.

The council has continued to exercise Policy 2.1, Employment At Will, when appropriate and warranted. It is important to note that while the existence of the at-will employment policy provides flexibility, it is the goal of the council to encourage quality communications in a rich and supportive working environment.

In February 2012, after a series of investigations concerning serious performance issues and violations of policy, Human Resources worked with Legal Services to draft a number of Performance Improvement Plans (PIP) to provide employees with opportunities for improvement and guidance to meet expected performance levels. In some cases, employees improved performance levels and remained on the job. In others, the AOC utilized its at-will employment policy to terminate individuals from employment for performance-related issues or serious violations of policy.

Since February 2012, the AOC has terminated a number of individuals for reasons stated above. Furthermore the at-will policy shaped the development of Policy 2.9, Reductions in Staffing (Layoffs).

On May 8, 2012, the Interim Administrative Director approved Policy 2.9, which provides guidance to implement staffing reductions based on non-discriminatory, business-related criteria. In June 2012, the AOC implemented a layoff to achieve cost savings, resulting in the termination of 40 employees.

The Performance Review Program will remain a vital tool for the council management and supervisors to develop and support staff. Performance improvement plans and the use of at-will employment policy will continue to be a tool that can be utilized council managers and supervisors for addressing issues that arise with employee performance.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

Since the implementation of the performance review process and the use of performance improvement plans, six PIPs were initiated of which 4 were successful.

- Personnel Policies and Procedures, Policy Number 2.1: Employment At Will

AOC Utilization of the At-Will Employment Policy

The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) adopted a new AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual in July 2011. Chapter 2, General Employment Policies begins with Policy 2.1, Employment At Will. This policy clearly states that the AOC is an at-will employer. This means that both the employees and the AOC have the right to terminate employment at any time, with or without cause. Although this policy provides the AOC with the ability to terminate employment with or without cause, the reason for termination must be a lawful reason. Employees who are terminated from the AOC retain the right to file complaints with the Department of Fair Employment and Housing (DFEH) or the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) and potentially litigate damages against the AOC.

Recent Use of the At-Will Employment Policy

In February 2012 the AOC Human Resources Services Office (HRSO) investigated a number of serious employee-related issues. At the time the Interim Administrative Director of the Courts and the Interim Chief Deputy Director instructed the HRSO team to work collaboratively with the Legal Services Office (LSO) to address any serious performance issues or violations of policy. During this time HRSO staff drafted a number of Performance Improvement Plans (PIP) to provide opportunities for improvement and appropriate guidance to employees who had fallen below the expected performance levels.

Throughout this period the AOC continued to exercise the at-will policy when appropriate, and terminated individuals who did not demonstrate improved performance or seriously violated policies, procedures or ethical standards.

Since February 2012, the AOC has exercised the at-will policy and has terminated a number of individuals from employment for performance-related issues or for serious violations of policy or procedure. Although the AOC is an at-will employer, it has, at its discretion, provided the terminated employee with a written reason or rationale for the determination. The AOC generally provides written justification to the Employment Development Department (EDD) when considering claims for unemployment.

Reductions in Staffing Policy and AOC Layoffs

On May 18, 2012, the Interim Administrative Director approved Policy 2.9, Reductions in Staffing (Layoffs). This policy provides guidance, based on non-discriminatory, business-related criteria, to implement staffing reductions and achieve necessary cost savings. The at-will employment policy provided leadership the flexibility to develop the policy which met the needs of the AOC.

In June 2012 the AOC implemented its first round of layoffs. At the completion of the layoff process 40 individuals were separated from employment with the AOC.

Next Steps

While the existence of the at-will employment policy provides flexibility when making employment decisions, it is the goal of the AOC to encourage quality communications in a rich and supportive working environment. In order to achieve this goal the Administrative Director has directed the Human Resources Services Office to fully implement Policy 3.9, Performance Management Program, of the AOC Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual.

In order to properly institute a quality and meaningful program a number of steps need to occur to create a foundation for true performance management. The AOC will outline these steps in a report to the Judicial Council in June 2013, with a plan for full implementation beginning January 2014. The AOC will implement a uniform performance management program throughout the AOC.

Additionally, the AOC will review Policy 8.1, Standards of Conduct, and amend it to clearly express the conduct expectations of AOC employees and the disciplinary process for issues related to performance or misconduct. Specifically, the AOC will add an official Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) process to the disciplinary process, which will highlight to employees that communication is the most effective method of initiating growth and change. To strengthen the process, the AOC, through the classification and compensation study, will be updating job descriptions for all employees, which will ensure the program accurately accounts for employee performance and makes it easier for managers and supervisors to identify areas for improvement.

Furthermore, the supervisor/manager training program, initiated in January 2013, will provide direct guidance to managers and supervisors on identifying performance gaps and effective methods of performance management as well as outlining the challenges of managing employees in an at-will environment.

The first set of courses focus on “The At-Will Environment and Other Legal Issues.” The AOC will conduct eight sessions on this topic between May 1, 2013 and June 20, 2013. The training continues throughout the year, with culminating sessions, which highlight performance management, in November and December 2013. After the training, the utilization of a uniform performance management program, combined with clear discipline procedures, the at-will policy and accurate job descriptions, will provide the AOC with a flexible and responsible approach to address and resolve any performance or conduct concerns.

Policy Number: 2.1

Policy Statement: The AOC is an at-will employer.

All employment at the AOC is "at will." This means that both employees and the AOC have the right to terminate employment at any time, with or without advance notice, and with or without cause. No one other than the Administrative Director of the Courts has the authority to alter this arrangement, to enter into an agreement for employment for a specified period of time, or to make any agreement contrary to this at-will policy. Any such agreement must be in writing, signed by the Administrative Director of the Courts, in order to be effective.

This directive was completed with the development and implementation of a Performance Review Program effective July 1, 2013, for all council employees.

Human Resources outlined the performance review process in July 2013, in conjunction with the AOC management training courses.

The implementation of a performance management program throughout the AOC has been developed with the goal of ensuring that employees have the adequate resources and support to succeed in performing their jobs which are essential to the daily functions of the council as a support structure for the judicial branch. Effective communication and feedback are essential to both employee performance and customer service. The performance management program provides a mechanism for consistent feedback with formal documentation each year memorializing professional skills competencies as well as project and assignment accomplishments.

The Performance Review Program will remain a vital tool for the council and will continue as a regular business practice for council management and supervisors to develop and support staff.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

All 706 council employees are required to have a performance review. As of March 2015, 78% of the employees have received their performance evaluation with the goal of 100% by the end of the first full year of the program.

All performance evaluations are developed by managers and supervisors, and shared with Human Resources to ensure consistency in compliance.

In June of 2015 the council will receive a report providing status on the percentage of council staff that have received a performance review in the first year.

PERFORMANCE MANAGEMENT PROCESS GUIDELINES

The purpose of the Performance Management Process is to support and enhance the long-term success of the organization and its employees. The process focuses on involving supervisors and employees in identifying meaningful performance expectations that support the organization's goals, recognize individuals' contributions, and foster continuous development of employees. The planning and review process is designed to facilitate communication between supervisors and employees. A sample Performance Plan and Review Form is attached to these guidelines for reference.

OVERVIEW OF THE PROCESS

The process begins by planning and defining performance expectations for the upcoming plan period. The supervisor and employee meet to develop an annual performance plan by reviewing the performance factors and expectations necessary to successfully perform the employee's job duties as stated in the job description. As further defined below, performance factors reflect the skills necessary in order to successfully perform the job. Performance factors and specific tasks should be modified to reflect the employee's particular responsibilities. Key objectives, major goals or special assignments should be identified for each performance factor.

The supervisor and employee also create a development plan by identifying action steps that the employee will take to develop and/or enhance his/her job-related knowledge, skills, and abilities. The Annual Performance Plan and Review Form shall be utilized to record the planning and performance review process.

Throughout the planning and development cycle, the supervisor and employee should meet periodically to review progress and update expectations as needed. The planning cycle ends with an overall review of results accomplished during the previous year. Each cycle should last for one year from the date of initiation. However, plans may be adjusted throughout the year to reflect accomplishments, completed projects or areas needing improvement. A Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) may be initiated at any time to identify critical areas needing immediate improvement.

It is the responsibility of the employee's supervisor, manager and office leadership to ensure that all plans and reviews are completed and submitted to the Human Resources Services Office on a timely basis.

ANNUAL PERFORMANCE PLAN AND REVIEW

Development of Initial Plan

The process begins with the development of an initial performance review plan. Plan development can occur when a new employee is hired, when a job classification changes or when an individual transfers to a new unit. The initial plan should consist of a discussion, expectation setting and the development of anticipated duties, projects or goals.

Feedback Periods

It is expected that supervisors will provide feedback to the employee during each review period. The supervisor should reinforce the positive work habits and provide constructive feedback on improving areas where further development is necessary.

Prior to Annual Review

In the month before the formal annual review, the supervisor should provide the employee with an Employee Self-Assessment form [hyperlink]. This form will allow employees to provide comments on their own performance during the past year. This is an informal document that the supervisor will consider when completing the annual review.

Annual Assessment Meeting

Within a month of each employee's annual review date, it is expected that every supervisor will meet with the employee and conduct an interactive meeting where the supervisor will conduct the Annual Review. At the conclusion of the meeting the employee will be asked to sign the review to verify that the review took place. By signing, the employee is not agreeing to the contents of the review, but that the review was conducted.

During the review meeting, if the employee provides new information that may result in modifications to the review; the supervisor may make any desired changes and schedule a follow-up meeting with the employee prior to finalizing the annual review. The follow-up meeting would then take place and the employee would be asked to sign the revised review.

Rebuttal Period

If an employee disagrees with the supervisor's review, he or she may prepare a rebuttal. This rebuttal should be submitted to the supervisor no later than ten business days from the date the employee received the performance review. The employee's rebuttal should be attached to the review and both documents will be placed in the employee's personnel file.

Completing the Annual Performance and Plan Review

1. Performance Factors

To complete the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form, the supervisor and employee should first review and discuss the performance factors described on the plan. Performance factors should reflect the most significant work responsibilities for the employee during the planning period under consideration.

In preparing the plan, supervisors and employees should review the Professional Skills section. Each area is available for selection through the drop-down menu - when a skill is selected, a descriptor for that skill will appear in the selected area. Supervisors will then determine if the individual “exceeds expectations,” “meets expectations,” or “needs improvement” in each of the selected areas. Please note that, for areas such as punctuality, an “exceeds expectations” is not appropriate since it is a basic job expectation arrive to work as assigned. Any performance factors or specific tasks listed in the drop down menu that are not currently performed and will not be performed during the review period should not be identified.

Each area listed below is available for review. An employee review may include all these areas, but should contain no less than five of the areas listed:

- Technical and Professional Expertise
- Problem Solving
- Computer Skills
- Time Management
- Written Communications
- Verbal Communication
- Initiative
- Setting High Standards
- Relationship Building
- Customer Services
- Organizational Skills
- Punctuality

Additional performance factors and tasks should be added to the employee’s plan if the listed factors do not adequately represent the employee’s responsibilities.

2. Employee Development: Duties, Projects or Goals

The second, more specific area of the review process is the Duties, Projects or Goals section. In this section the supervisor and employee should identify duties, projects or goals anticipated to be developed or completed during the next year. When considering an appropriate area to identify, supervisors may consider the following areas:

- Base load/ongoing work
- Time-limited assignments
- Multi-year projects with current milestones
- Special projects and assignments
- Job skills and development expectations
- Organizational skills, communication skills, and working relations
- Supervision, leadership and direction
- Reliability/punctuality (included for non-exempt classifications)

When identifying a duty, project or goal, try to be as specific as possible in the description of the item in the descriptor box. During the initial discussion regarding the performance and development plan, the employee and supervisor should discuss how the factors will be evaluated and weighted.

3. Measuring Performance

Each performance factor should be an accurate reflection of the employee's performance during the past year. If there is an area where the employee has generally performed well, but has worked through a few rough patches during the year, the rating of "meets expectations" may be appropriate. However, in the comments section, any issues that occurred during the review period should be noted.

Performance on duties, projects or goals should be rated based on the individual performance of that individual during the review period. Key indicators could be:

- Work Performed: Quantity, quality, and effectiveness of work, including accuracy, thoroughness, and consistency; time management, meeting deadlines, and compliance with policies and rules.
- Job Knowledge and Ability: Job-specific knowledge, skills and abilities; problem identification, analysis, and resolution; decision making; the ability to learn, retain, and apply instructions, policies, and other information.
- Adherence to timelines: Were projects or other measurable items delivered in a reasonable timeframe at an acceptable level of quality?
- Working Relationships: When completing the project, duty or goal, did the individual work cooperatively with other members of the team or with other stakeholders?

The comment section of the review plan is extremely important for the duties, projects or goals section of the review. Comments should be made in any section where a rating has been reflected. However, managers and supervisors should place special emphasis on areas which received an "exceeds expectations" or "needs improvement" rating. If an individual has been rated as “exceeds expectations,” list a reason why that rating was provided, cite an example that provides the employee, as well as future supervisors, with the skill or performance that led to this rating. If the employee was rated as “needs improvement,” cite reasons why this rating was provided and give clarifying guidelines on what is needed for improvement. Please keep in mind that this tool is utilized to provide feedback to an employee with the goal of ensuring that all individuals are successful in their job duties.

FEEDBACK DURING THE ANNUAL REVIEW PERIOD

Supervisors should give employees feedback about their performance on an ongoing basis. At a minimum, supervisors should discuss the performance and development plan with the employee after six months. The supervisor and employee should review the employee’s progress toward meeting his or her performance goals. This discussion also provides an opportunity for the supervisor to recognize the employee’s progress to date, as well as to offer direction where needed. Changing business conditions may warrant revising plans and objectives.

PERFORMANCE IMPROVEMENT PLANS

When an employee is experiencing difficulty in either a specific area or in overall performance, the development of a Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) may be implemented to provide the employee with guidance and clear expectations for performance improvement.

The PIP should identify areas of performance needing improvement and strategies on how that improvement could be achieved. The PIP should also identify a timeline of when performance improvement is expected to occur. Failure to demonstrate improvement either during the PIP or at the review date could result in disciplinary action up to and including the possibility of termination.

Issuance of a PIP does not in any way alter the at-will employment status, nor does the timeline for anticipated improvement imply an employment contract.

Contact: Human Resources Services Office, Labor and Employee Relations Unit

Policy Statement: The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) requires periodic feedback to employees regarding their job performance in an effort to best serve the judicial branch while recognizing employee achievements and contributions to the AOC.

Contents: (A) Employee Performance Management Program
(B) Employee Performance Management Cycle
(C) Performance Improvement Plan

(A) Employee Performance Management Program

The performance management program functions as a method to advance AOC operational objectives while recognizing employee achievements and contributions to the AOC. Managing employee performance is an ongoing communication process between a supervisor and an employee. The communication process is a cycle that includes clarifying expectations, identifying and setting goals, providing feedback, and evaluating performance. Overseeing employee performance and providing feedback is not an isolated event, rather it is an ongoing cycle that occurs throughout the year.

(B) Employee Performance Management Cycle

The employee performance management cycle consists of three phases: planning, feedback, and assessment.

Planning

Supervisors will develop an annual performance plan, using the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form [hyperlink], to direct employees toward achieving specific goals that support the AOC's operational objectives and the employees' professional success. At a minimum, every employee at the AOC will be evaluated on an annual basis, using the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form.

Supervisors must communicate with employees regarding their performance expectations throughout the year. Supervisors and employees should collaborate on developing performance goals and expectations. Early planning to achieve goals, together with mutual communication, pave the path to a successful working relationship.

Guidelines for Determination of the Annual Performance Plan and Setting an Assessment Meeting:

1. The date of the employee's last step increase will be the designated date for the annual assessment meeting.
2. If the employee's step increase date changes, the new step increase date will become the new evaluation and planning date.
3. If the employee's job classification changes and more than 180 days have passed since the last performance review date, the annual performance plan from the past job classification will be completed by the past supervisor and a new performance plan will be initiated by the new supervisor.
4. If the employee's job classification changes and less than 180 days have passed since the last performance review date, a new performance plan will be initiated by the new supervisor utilizing appropriate information from the past performance review plan.
5. If the employee's supervisor changes during the annual review period, but the job classification has not changed, the new supervisor will be responsible for completing the annual performance review and may consider feedback from the prior supervisor. The new supervisor shall meet with the employee to clarify expectations and may revise the performance plan to meet the needs of the employee's new assignment.

Feedback

Once the performance plan is in place, supervisors are responsible for initiating and providing periodic feedback to employees regarding their job performance. Employees may also request feedback on their performance from their supervisors at any time.

While AOC policy states that employee performance should be formally assessed once a year, it is strongly recommended that employees receive a verbal or written performance assessment and feedback on a more frequent basis. Supervisors should acknowledge employee accomplishments or address needs for improved performance as often as necessary. Feedback should be specific to reinforce positive results or provide guidance in areas that need improvement. Supervisors should utilize collaboration, coaching and feedback to ensure that employees achieve positive outcomes.

Assessment

At the end of the annual performance period, the employee's performance is measured against goals established through the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form in the prior year. This annual assessment meeting is an opportunity for supervisors to communicate with employees regarding their performance over the past year, evaluate employees' job satisfaction, and make plans for employees' performance goals.

At the conclusion of the assessment meeting, the supervisor will ask the employee to sign and date the form that summarizes the employee's performance over the prior year. The supervisor will explain to the employee that the signature acknowledges the contents of their discussion, but is not necessarily an agreement with the supervisor's assessment. Afterwards, the supervisor routes the document to office leadership for final signatures, provides a copy of the signed form to the employee, and sends a copy to the assigned Pay and Benefits Specialist for placement in the employee's personnel file.

(C) Performance Improvement Plan

An employee who is experiencing performance challenges may be placed on a Performance Improvement Plan ("PIP") [hyperlink] with the goal of identifying areas of improvement as well as guiding the employee to improved performance.

The PIP contents will communicate to the employee: (1) specific areas of work performance that are below expected standards, (2) a plan for improving the employee's work performance, (3) a time frame within which the employee is expected to make improvements, and (4) possible consequences should the employee fail to raise his/her performance to meet the expected standards.

The purpose of the PIP is to inform the employee that certain deficiencies have been detected and to give the employee an opportunity to correct or improve their work performance before further action is taken.

Council Directive 29

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to develop an employment discipline policy to be implemented consistently across the entire AOC that provides for performance improvement plans and for the actual utilization of progressive discipline.

SEC Recommendation 7-38

A consistent employment discipline policy must accompany the employee performance appraisal system. Section 8.1B of the AOC personnel manual discusses disciplinary action, but is inadequate. The AOC drafted a new performance management policy, effective July 1, 2013, which addresses the mandatory performance review of all employees on an annual basis.

In April 26, 2013, the Judicial Council approved an amendment to Judicial Council Directive 29 to remove the reference to a progressive discipline system in the Directive's language. Human Resources has clarified that, as an at-will employer, the council is not required to, nor does it routinely, practice progressive discipline like in unionized environments.

The council realizes that a method to rectify performance issues is still necessary. The follow-up meeting would then take place and the employee would be asked to sign the revised review.

Rebuttal Period

If an employee disagrees with the supervisor's review, he or she may prepare a rebuttal. This rebuttal should be submitted to the supervisor no later than ten business days from the date the employee received the performance review. The employee's rebuttal should be attached to the review and both documents will be placed in the employee's personnel file.

Completing the Annual Performance and Plan Review

1. Performance Factors

To complete the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form, the supervisor and employee should first review and discuss the performance factors described on the plan. Performance factors should reflect the most significant work responsibilities for the employee during the planning period under consideration.

In preparing the plan, supervisors and employees should review the Professional Skills section. Each area is available for selection through the drop-down menu - when a skill is selected, a descriptor for that skill will appear in the selected area. Supervisors will then determine if the individual “exceeds expectations,” “meets expectations,” or “needs improvement” in each of the selected areas. Please note that, for areas such as punctuality, an “exceeds expectations” is not appropriate since it is a basic job expectation arrive to work as assigned. Any performance factors or specific tasks listed in the drop down menu that are not currently performed and will not be performed during the review period should not be identified.

Each area listed below is available for review. An employee review may include all these areas, but should contain no less than five of the areas listed:

- Technical and Professional Expertise
- Problem Solving
- Computer Skills
- Time Management
- Written Communications
- Verbal Communication
- Initiative
- Setting High Standards
- Relationship Building
- Customer Services
- Organizational Skills
- Punctuality

Additional performance factors and tasks should be added to the employee’s plan if the listed factors do not adequately represent the employee’s responsibilities.

2. Employee Development: Duties, Projects or Goals

The second, more specific area of the review process is the Duties, Projects or Goals section. In this section the supervisor and employee should identify duties, projects or goals anticipated to be developed or completed during the next year. When considering an appropriate area to identify, supervisors may consider the following areas:

- Base load/ongoing work
- Time-limited assignments
- Multi-year projects with current milestones
- Special projects and assignments
- Job skills and development expectations
- Organizational skills, communication skills, and working relations
- Supervision, leadership and direction
- Reliability/punctuality (included for non-exempt classifications)

When identifying a duty, project or goal, try to be as specific as possible in the description of the item in the descriptor box. During the initial discussion regarding the performance and development plan, the employee and supervisor should discuss how the factors will be evaluated and weighted.

3. Measuring Performance

Each performance factor should be an accurate reflection of the employee's performance during the past year. If there is an area where the employee has generally performed well, but has worked through a few rough patches during the year, the rating of "meets expectations" may be appropriate. However, in the comments section, any issues that occurred during the review period should be noted.

Performance on duties, projects or goals should be rated based on the individual performance of that individual during the review period. Key indicators could be:

- Work Performed: Quantity, quality, and effectiveness of work, including accuracy, thoroughness, and consistency; time management, meeting deadlines, and compliance with policies and rules.
- Job Knowledge and Ability: Job-specific knowledge, skills and abilities; problem identification, analysis, and resolution; decision making; the ability to learn, retain, and apply instructions, policies, and other information.
- Adherence to timelines: Were projects or other measurable items delivered in a reasonable timeframe at an acceptable level of quality?
- Working Relationships: When completing the project, duty or goal, did the individual work cooperatively with other members of the team or with other stakeholders?

The comment section of the review plan is extremely important for the duties, projects or goals section of the review. Comments should be made in any section where a rating has been reflected. However, managers and supervisors should place special emphasis on areas which received an "exceeds expectations" or "needs improvement" rating. If an individual has been rated as “exceeds expectations,” list a reason why that rating was provided, cite an example that provides the employee, as well as future supervisors, with the skill or performance that led to this rating. If the employee was rated as “needs improvement,” cite reasons why this rating was provided and give clarifying guidelines on what is needed for improvement. Please keep in mind that this tool is utilized to provide feedback to an employee with the goal of ensuring that all individuals are successful in their job duties.

FEEDBACK DURING THE ANNUAL REVIEW PERIOD

Supervisors should give employees feedback about their performance on an ongoing basis. At a minimum, supervisors should discuss the performance and development plan with the employee after six months. The supervisor and employee should review the employee’s progress toward meeting his or her performance goals. This discussion also provides an opportunity for the supervisor to recognize the employee’s progress to date, as well as to offer direction where needed. Changing business conditions may warrant revising plans and objectives.

PERFORMANCE IMPROVEMENT PLANS

When an employee is experiencing difficulty in either a specific area or in overall performance, the development of a Performance Improvement Plan (PIP) may be implemented to provide the employee with guidance and clear expectations for performance improvement.

The PIP should identify areas of performance needing improvement and strategies on how that improvement could be achieved. The PIP should also identify a timeline of when performance improvement is expected to occur. Failure to demonstrate improvement either during the PIP or at the review date could result in disciplinary action up to and including the possibility of termination.

Issuance of a PIP does not in any way alter the at-will employment status, nor does the timeline for anticipated improvement imply an employment contract.

Title: Performance Management Program

Contact: Human Resources Services Office, Labor and Employee Relations Unit

Policy Statement: The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) requires periodic feedback to employees regarding their job performance in an effort to best serve the judicial branch while recognizing employee achievements and contributions to the AOC.

Contents: (A) Employee Performance Management Program
(B) Employee Performance Management Cycle
(C) Performance Improvement Plan

(A) Employee Performance Management Program

The performance management program functions as a method to advance AOC operational objectives while recognizing employee achievements and contributions to the AOC. Managing employee performance is an ongoing communication process between a supervisor and an employee. The communication process is a cycle that includes clarifying expectations, identifying and setting goals, providing feedback, and evaluating performance. Overseeing employee performance and providing feedback is not an isolated event, rather it is an ongoing cycle that occurs throughout the year.

(B) Employee Performance Management Cycle

The employee performance management cycle consists of three phases: planning, feedback, and assessment.

Planning

Supervisors will develop an annual performance plan, using the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form [hyperlink], to direct employees toward achieving specific goals that support the AOC's operational objectives and the employees' professional success. At a minimum, every employee at the AOC will be evaluated on an annual basis, using the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form.

Supervisors must communicate with employees regarding their performance expectations throughout the year. Supervisors and employees should collaborate on developing performance goals and expectations. Early planning to achieve goals, together with mutual communication, pave the path to a successful working relationship.

Guidelines for Determination of the Annual Performance Plan and Setting an Assessment Meeting:

1. The date of the employee's last step increase will be the designated date for the annual assessment meeting.
2. If the employee's step increase date changes, the new step increase date will become the new evaluation and planning date.
3. If the employee's job classification changes and more than 180 days have passed since the last performance review date, the annual performance plan from the past job classification will be completed by the past supervisor and a new performance plan will be initiated by the new supervisor.
4. If the employee's job classification changes and less than 180 days have passed since the last performance review date, a new performance plan will be initiated by the new supervisor utilizing appropriate information from the past performance review plan.
5. If the employee's supervisor changes during the annual review period, but the job classification has not changed, the new supervisor will be responsible for completing the annual performance review and may consider feedback from the prior supervisor. The new supervisor shall meet with the employee to clarify expectations and may revise the performance plan to meet the needs of the employee's new assignment.

Feedback

Once the performance plan is in place, supervisors are responsible for initiating and providing periodic feedback to employees regarding their job performance. Employees may also request feedback on their performance from their supervisors at any time.

While AOC policy states that employee performance should be formally assessed once a year, it is strongly recommended that employees receive a verbal or written performance assessment and feedback on a more frequent basis. Supervisors should acknowledge employee accomplishments or address needs for improved performance as often as necessary. Feedback should be specific to reinforce positive results or provide guidance in areas that need improvement. Supervisors should utilize collaboration, coaching and feedback to ensure that employees achieve positive outcomes.

Assessment

At the end of the annual performance period, the employee's performance is measured against goals established through the Annual Performance Plan and Review Form in the prior year. This annual assessment meeting is an opportunity for supervisors to communicate with employees regarding their performance over the past year, evaluate employees' job satisfaction, and make plans for employees' performance goals.

At the conclusion of the assessment meeting, the supervisor will ask the employee to sign and date the form that summarizes the employee's performance over the prior year. The supervisor will explain to the employee that the signature acknowledges the contents of their discussion, but is not necessarily an agreement with the supervisor's assessment. Afterwards, the supervisor routes the document to office leadership for final signatures, provides a copy of the signed form to the employee, and sends a copy to the assigned Pay and Benefits Specialist for placement in the employee's personnel file.

(C) Performance Improvement Plan

An employee who is experiencing performance challenges may be placed on a Performance Improvement Plan ("PIP") [hyperlink] with the goal of identifying areas of improvement as well as guiding the employee to improved performance.

The PIP contents will communicate to the employee: (1) specific areas of work performance that are below expected standards, (2) a plan for improving the employee's work performance, (3) a time frame within which the employee is expected to make improvements, and (4) possible consequences should the employee fail to raise his/her performance to meet the expected standards.

The purpose of the PIP is to inform the employee that certain deficiencies have been detected and to give the employee an opportunity to correct or improve their work performance before further action is taken.

- Personnel Policies and Procedures, Policy Number 2.9: Reductions in Staffing (Layoffs) Policy, revised May 18, 2012

Policy Number: 2.9

Title: Reductions in Staffing (Layoffs)

Contact: Administrative Services Division, Human Resources Office

Policy Statement: The AOC may implement reductions in staffing based on nondiscriminatory business-related criteria to accomplish necessary cost savings.

Contents:

- (A) Overview
- (B) Layoff Criteria and Procedures
  - (1) Determining Scope of Layoffs
  - (2) Identifying Classifications Subject to Layoff
  - (3) Identifying Affected Employees Within Classification
  - (4) Option to Apply for Vacant Essential Positions
- (C) No Recall

(A) Overview

Consistent with Policy 2.8 \(Personnel-Related Cost Savings Measures\), the AOC may implement reductions in staffing to accomplish necessary cost savings. Reductions in staffing will be based on nondiscriminatory, business-related criteria. Before layoffs are implemented, the AOC will evaluate cost saving alternatives to attempt to avoid or minimize the need for layoffs. If, however, layoffs are deemed necessary, the following procedures will be implemented.

(B) Layoff Criteria and Procedures

(1) Determining Scope of Layoffs

In the event layoffs are necessary, the Executive Office will determine the scope of necessary reductions in staff and the allocation of those reductions across divisions. Layoffs may be implemented on an organizational basis, or in one or more divisions, units, or job classifications.

(2) Identifying Classifications Subject to Layoff

If staff reductions are required within a division, the division director, in consultation with the Human Resources Office, will identify classifications within which positions can be eliminated, reduced, or combined based on the operational needs of the AOC as determined by Judicial Council priorities. The Human Resources Office may also identify positions that may be eliminated, reduced, or combined across divisions, based on similar duties or subject matter areas.

(3) Identifying Affected Employees Within Classification

Where positions within a classification are to be eliminated, the division director, in consultation with the Human Resources Office, will evaluate the order of positions for layoff based on the operational needs of the AOC as determined by Judicial Council priorities and a combination of factors, including the affected employees':

- (a) Specialized knowledge, skills, or abilities;
- (b) Ability to cover multiple functions within the division;
- (c) Prior work experience;
- (d) Documented work performance; and
- (e) Length of service with the AOC.

Length of service with the AOC will be considered when the factors listed above in (a) through (d) are essentially equal. If length of service is a factor considered, breaks in service and leaves of absences will not be considered in determining seniority, unless otherwise required by law.

The Executive Office will review and, if in agreement, approve the recommended action for any reductions in staff. Identification of employees for layoff will be in accordance with AOC policy, including Employment at Will, policy 2.1, Equal Employment Opportunity, policy 2.2, and Personnel-Related Cost Saving Measures, policy 2.8.

(4) Option to Apply for Vacant Essential Positions

The Executive Office will determine whether employees identified for layoff will be afforded the option to apply for vacant essential positions. In making that determination, the Executive Office may consider the status of judicial branch or AOC funding decisions, the need to minimize disruption of work and related inefficiencies, and any other factors that the Executive Office considers relevant. If the Executive Office determines that employees identified for layoff will be afforded the option to apply for vacant essential positions, the following steps will generally be followed.

- (a) In consultation with the division director, the Human Resources Office will identify:
  - Vacant positions that, if not filled, will significantly impede the division's ability to support Judicial Council priorities; and
  - Of the employees identified for layoff, those employees, if any, who are qualified to fill such vacant, essential positions.
- (b) Qualified affected employees will be notified of their option to elect to be considered for such vacant positions. Positions will be filled through an internal recruitment process, based on the operational needs of the AOC as determined by council priorities.

- (c) Employees identified for layoff who either do not have an option for continued at-will employment or who do not indicate interest in any vacant position as instructed will be separated from employment.

(C) No Recall

Layoffs result in separation from employment with no right of recall. Employees who are laid off are eligible, however, to apply in the future for open AOC positions for which they are qualified.

Judicial Council Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual

Summary of Changes and Additions

January 9, 2015

Human Resources reviewed all policies within the new Manual. Each change is outlined below; some edits were minor and consisted of changes to a specific office name, while other edits were comprehensive and included significant changes to the policy.

All policies have been modified to reflect the reorganizational change in office names and eliminating the use of Administrative Office of the Courts.

Policy	Title	Changes
	Forward	This section has been modified to reflect recent efforts to update the new Manual .
1.1	Introduction	The changes within this policy expand upon the current policy statement.
2.2	Equal Employment Opportunity	The term "unlawfully" was removed to demonstrate that the Judicial Council does not engage in any type of discrimination. Discrimination based on sex was also expanded to include breastfeeding. Gender identity and expression are also included under that definition based on Gov. Code 12926(r)(2). Military and veteran statuses are added by AB 556. Section B, last paragraph, was added by Legal Services per SB 400 (amends Labor Code 230).
2.3	Policy Against Harassment	The purpose of the policy has been modified to reflect the various types of harassment and now incorporates harassment based on race, color, religious creed, and sex, and can also include breastfeeding. Additionally, Human Resources (HR) has added language to specify available avenues for reporting conduct that conflicts with policy.
2.4	Safety Policy and Workplace Violence Prevention	The policy now states that employees will be required to participate in job-specific health and safety training. Security risks should continue to be reported to the Court Operations Services or HR depending on the nature of the threat.
2.5	Fitness for Duty	Section C has been expanded to incorporate travel to and from the examination location, and allows employees to receive paid time off for the duration of the exam and related travel time.
3.1	Hiring	Section A (4) has been updated to incorporate language that requires HR to conduct all internal and external reference checks before an offer of employment is made. Furthermore, for internal recruitments, the applicant's current Judicial Council supervisor must be contacted for the reference prior to offers of employment.

3.2	Background Investigation Policy	Section D, effective 7/1/14, Labor Code sec. 432.9 prohibits employers from asking applications to disclose convictions until determined that applicants meet MQs. Effective 1/1/14, Labor Code 432.7 prohibits asking applicants to disclose convictions that have been judicially dismissed or ordered sealed (HRs form has been updated to reflect this change).
3.3	Job Categories	For clarity, the term "temporary" has been replaced by "limited term" to minimize confusion with "temporary agency workers." Human Resources has also eliminated the reference to the Director's Intern classification as it is no longer exists.  The policy also formally acknowledges the use of temporary agency workers for limited periods of time and provides the Chief Administrative Officer with the ability to grant exceptions to the limited time duration for extenuating circumstances.
3.4	Classification Management Program	The changes to this policy stress the importance of consulting with the Classification & Compensation unit before proposing any changes to classifications.
3.5	Out-of-Class Assignments	The changes to this policy further emphasize that requests for an out-of-class assignment must be made through submission of a Personnel Action Request (PAR) form.  Section D now includes a statement that the Chief Administrative Officer has the sole authority to extend out-of-class assignments past the 120-day limit.  The following section was also added: If an employee is promoted into their out-of-class assignment, the current out-of-class salary will be retained and the anniversary date will be the date of promotion in accordance with Salary Administration, Policy 4.3(E), Salary Adjustment on Promotion.
3.6	Promotions and Transfers	Adds a statement in 3.6 (C) stating that internal reference checks must be coordinated by Human Resources before a promotion or transfer is approved to a new office or unit.
3.7	Training and Development Assignments	The changes to this policy further emphasize that requests for a training and development assignment must be made through submission of a Personnel Action Request (PAR) form.

		Section D of the policy now restates the language to minimize confusion regarding the assignment and classification, salary, and anniversary dates. Additionally, the policy now provides guidance and expectations for managers who wish to place an employee on a training and development assignment. Periodic training and development progress reports are also mandatory.
3.8	Minimum Education Requirements	Employees who participate in approved training offered by a provider other than the Judicial Council may be eligible for reimbursement of training costs or travel costs if approved in advance by the employee's supervisor AND office leadership.
3.9	Performance Management Program	This policy now incorporates a mandatory annual review for all Judicial Council employees and the use of a performance improvement plan, as needed.
3.10	Separation from Employment	The Chief Administrative Officer is now considered the approving authority for requests from employees who wish to file for reinstatement if they are terminated as a result of a failure to report to work or return from leave. Section C of the policy has been updated to reflect a requirement to notify the Labor and Employee Relations Unit of all scheduled separations.
3.11	Reinstatement	Similar to Policy 3.10, the Chief Administrative Officer is now considered the approving authority for requests from employees who wish to file for reinstatement under any circumstances. Section B of the policy further limits the use of retired annuitants as defined by CalPERS; retired annuitants must be serving in a temporary or specialized area and must be retired for more than 180 calendar days before beginning employment as a retired annuitant.
4.1	Salary Structure	The policy now states that the Chief of Staff and the Chief Administrative Officer must approve all requests for a change to a particular salary range.
4.2	Geographic Salary Differentials	The third to last paragraph in Section B has been added to notify offices at the beginning of each fiscal year that HR will collect the following data: regular work hours, primary work location, and when applicable, multiple work location schedules. The last paragraph in Section B of the policy has been modified to be consistent in the language used in the second paragraph.

		If the temporary assignment results in a pay decrease, as a result of a change to the employee's primary work location, then these requests must be approved by the Chief Administrative Officer. A new section was also added:  All PARs requesting a primary work location change must include the business justification for the change. Justifications must explain how the planned work location change will improve service delivery to judicial branch entities as well as any cost implications (e.g., leased office space). All PARs must be approved by the Chief Administrative Officer prior to any actual change in primary work location.
4.3	Salary Administration	The policy now states that all requests for salary offers above the minimum of the range must be requested by office leadership for approval by the Chief Administrative Officer or designee. The Chief Administrative Officer will make the final determination of the salary level for each individual request based on the criteria in this section. Furthermore, if a step increase is denied or deferred, the Pay and Benefits Administration Unit must be immediately notified in writing of the decision not to grant the step increase. If the step increase is deferred, the supervisor of the affected employee may grant the deferred step increase at a date not to exceed 12 months from the original step increase review date.
4.4	Hours of Work (Exempt and Nonexempt)	Section A of the policy now requires the Chief Administrative Officer to approve any regular work schedule starting earlier than 7 a.m. or later than 9 a.m. It also requires offices to maintain a current record of every employee's approved work schedule and to submit to HR. Offices should also submit any updates to HR if a change is made to an employee's schedule. Section B of the policy now states that employees must also obtain approval from their supervisor for all planned absences--either for a full or up to half-day duration. Section C has additional language to clarify that full-time, nonexempt employees are expected to be assigned to 40 hours per week. Section C (1) of the policy now states that direct supervisors or managers, in lieu of office leadership, can approve overtime work.

		Office leadership, however, should verify all overtime submitted within their office. The changes to the policy also state that, once employees reach the 120-hour CTO threshold, they may no longer elect CTO as compensation for overtime until their CTO hours fall back below the threshold. Section C (3) (a) of the policy now states that for employees with more than one regular work location, the regular commute to and from a regularly assigned work location is not considered work time.
5.1	Holidays	Section B (4) of the policy correctly eliminates use of the term "transfer," in the context of reciprocity, when an employee leaves the Judicial Council and becomes employed by a state or judicial branch entity or vice versa.
5.2	Paid Time Off	Section B (3) (a) of the policy now includes the following language: Military emergency leave includes up to 15 days of unpaid leave to spend time with a military member who is on short-term, temporary rest and recuperation leave during deployment. Sections B (5) and Section E of the policy now includes the following language: For any leave of absence, employees must fully utilize all applicable accrued leave prior to being placed on unpaid status. If any additional leave is accrued during the leave of absence, the new leave must also be utilized before the employee is placed on unpaid status. Section B (5) also further clarifies that leave credits donated through the Catastrophic Leave Program may be used during the leave, but it will not extend the employee's leave entitlement. The previous wording used was not as clear. Section 7 (B) of the policy now states the following: The Judicial Council may require an employee to resubmit medical certification. Section B (8) has also been added to the policy:  Maintaining Time Records  Each month when an employee submits the monthly timesheet, the employee must designate any time that related directly to the approved Family Medical Leave.

		All employees, both exempt and non-exempt, are to report approved Family Medical Leave in 15-minute increments (.25 hour). Section E of the policy has been updated to include the following language in the last paragraph:  Personal leave requests should not be used in lieu of medical leaves or medical accommodations.
5.3	Leaves of Absence	Section B (3) (a) of the policy now includes the following language: Military emergency leave includes up to 15 days of unpaid leave to spend time with a military member who is on short-term, temporary rest and recuperation leave during deployment. Sections B (5) and Section E of the policy now includes the following language: For any leave of absence, employees must fully utilize all applicable accrued leave prior to being placed on unpaid status. If any additional leave is accrued during the leave of absence, the new leave must also be utilized before the employee is placed on unpaid status. Section B (5) also further clarifies that leave credits donated through the Catastrophic Leave Program may be used during the leave, but it will not extend the employee's leave entitlement. The previous wording used was not as clear. Section 7 (B) of the policy now states the following: The Judicial Council may require an employee to resubmit medical certification. Section B (8) has also been added to the policy:  Maintaining Time Records  Each month when an employee submits the monthly timesheet, the employee must designate any time that related directly to the approved Family Medical Leave. All employees, both exempt and non-exempt, are to report approved Family Medical Leave in 15-minute increments (.25 hour). Section E of the policy has been updated to include the following language in the last paragraph:

		Personal leave requests should not be used in lieu of medical leaves or medical accommodations.
5.4	Other Time Off	Section C of the policy now clarifies what documents are needed in order for employees to receive paid time off for jury service: Employees providing jury service must submit all court issued certificates of service to receive paid time off. The jury summons is not acceptable as proof of jury service. When employees are required to call in to determine if their presence is required for the jury selection process, they are expected to attend work as normal and should leave only if selected to appear. If there are any specific questions about your current situation, please contact your pay and benefits specialist. Section F of the policy now includes emergency rescue training added by AB 11, and amends Labor Code Sec. 230.4 Section H now expands the definition of "immediate family member" by including the following groups: siblings of spouses or registered domestic partners, and grandparents of spouses or registered domestic partners. Section I of the policy now includes "affected employees may also seek workplace accommodations for their safety while at work, as stated in Equal Employment Opportunity, policy 2.2 (B). Added by SB 400, amends Labor Code 230. Section I also allows time off to employees who have been victims of stalking. Section J (2) has been added by SB 288, new Labor Code section 230.5.

6.4	Nonindustrial Disability Insurance (NDI)	References to the Department of Personnel Administration were updated to reflect the agency's new name, the California Department of Human Resources.
6.5	Voluntary Long-Term Disability Insurance	References to the Department of Personnel Administration were updated to reflect the agency's new name, the California Department of Human Resources.
6.6	Workers' Compensation Insurance	Throughout the policy, several sections have been expanded to include workers' compensation coverage for volunteers.  Section 2 (a) further clarifies that employees who elect not to supplement their temporary disability benefits with leave credits must pay full premium directly to carriers to maintain benefits coverage.
6.7	FlexElect Program	References to the Department of Personnel Administration were updated to reflect the agency's new name, the California Department of Human Resources.

Human Resources (HR) concluded its review of the Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual in July of 2014. In conducting its review, HR focused on updating policies to reflect legislative and organizational changes to the Judicial Council since July 2011, while simultaneously addressing issues raised by related Judicial Council Directives.

All policies were reviewed within different areas of the HR. The office also received feedback from the Legal Services.

Judicial Council Personnel Policies and Procedures Manual

Summary of Changes and Additions

January 9, 2015

Human Resources reviewed all policies within the new Manual. Each change is outlined below; some edits were minor and consisted of changes to a specific office name, while other edits were comprehensive and included significant changes to the policy.

All policies have been modified to reflect the reorganizational change in office names and eliminating the use of Administrative Office of the Courts.

Policy	Title	Changes
	Forward	This section has been modified to reflect recent efforts to update the new Manual .
1.1	Introduction	The changes within this policy expand upon the current policy statement.
2.2	Equal Employment Opportunity	The term "unlawfully" was removed to demonstrate that the Judicial Council does not engage in any type of discrimination. Discrimination based on sex was also expanded to include breastfeeding. Gender identity and expression are also included under that definition based on Gov. Code 12926(r)(2). Military and veteran statuses are added by AB 556.  Section B, last paragraph, was added by Legal Services per SB 400 (amends Labor Code 230).
2.3	Policy Against Harassment	The purpose of the policy has been modified to reflect the various types of harassment and now incorporates harassment based on race, color, religious creed, and sex, and can also include breastfeeding.  Additionally, Human Resources (HR) has added language to specify available avenues for reporting conduct that conflicts with policy.
2.4	Safety Policy and Workplace Violence Prevention	The policy now states that employees will be required to participate in job-specific health and safety training.  Security risks should continue to be reported to the Court Operations Services or HR depending on the nature of the threat.
2.5	Fitness for Duty	Section C has been expanded to incorporate travel to and from the examination location, and allows employees to receive paid time off for the duration of the exam and related travel time.
3.1	Hiring	Section A (4) has been updated to incorporate language that requires HR to conduct all internal and external reference checks before an offer of employment is made. Furthermore, for internal recruitments, the applicant's current Judicial Council supervisor must be contacted for the reference prior to offers of employment.

3.2	Background Investigation Policy	Section D, effective 7/1/14, Labor Code sec. 432.9 prohibits employers from asking applications to disclose convictions until determined that applicants meet MQs. Effective 1/1/14, Labor Code 432.7 prohibits asking applicants to disclose convictions that have been judicially dismissed or ordered sealed (HRs form has been updated to reflect this change).
3.3	Job Categories	For clarity, the term "temporary" has been replaced by "limited term" to minimize confusion with "temporary agency workers." Human Resources has also eliminated the reference to the Director's Intern classification as it is no longer exists.  The policy also formally acknowledges the use of temporary agency workers for limited periods of time and provides the Chief Administrative Officer with the ability to grant exceptions to the limited time duration for extenuating circumstances.
3.4	Classification Management Program	The changes to this policy stress the importance of consulting with the Classification & Compensation unit before proposing any changes to classifications.
3.5	Out-of-Class Assignments	The changes to this policy further emphasize that requests for an out-of-class assignment must be made through submission of a Personnel Action Request (PAR) form.  Section D now includes a statement that the Chief Administrative Officer has the sole authority to extend out-of-class assignments past the 120-day limit.  The following section was also added: If an employee is promoted into their out-of-class assignment, the current out-of-class salary will be retained and the anniversary date will be the date of promotion in accordance with Salary Administration, Policy 4.3(E), Salary Adjustment on Promotion.
3.6	Promotions and Transfers	Adds a statement in 3.6 (C) stating that internal reference checks must be coordinated by Human Resources before a promotion or transfer is approved to a new office or unit.
3.7	Training and Development Assignments	The changes to this policy further emphasize that requests for a training and development assignment must be made through submission of a Personnel Action Request (PAR) form.

		Section D of the policy now restates the language to minimize confusion regarding the assignment and classification, salary, and anniversary dates. Additionally, the policy now provides guidance and expectations for managers who wish to place an employee on a training and development assignment. Periodic training and development progress reports are also mandatory.
3.8	Minimum Education Requirements	Employees who participate in approved training offered by a provider other than the Judicial Council may be eligible for reimbursement of training costs or travel costs if approved in advance by the employee's supervisor AND office leadership.
3.9	Performance Management Program	This policy now incorporates a mandatory annual review for all Judicial Council employees and the use of a performance improvement plan, as needed.
3.10	Separation from Employment	The Chief Administrative Officer is now considered the approving authority for requests from employees who wish to file for reinstatement if they are terminated as a result of a failure to report to work or return from leave. Section C of the policy has been updated to reflect a requirement to notify the Labor and Employee Relations Unit of all scheduled separations.
3.11	Reinstatement	Similar to Policy 3.10, the Chief Administrative Officer is now considered the approving authority for requests from employees who wish to file for reinstatement under any circumstances. Section B of the policy further limits the use of retired annuitants as defined by CalPERS; retired annuitants must be serving in a temporary or specialized area and must be retired for more than 180 calendar days before beginning employment as a retired annuitant.
4.1	Salary Structure	The policy now states that the Chief of Staff and the Chief Administrative Officer must approve all requests for a change to a particular salary range.
4.2	Geographic Salary Differentials	The third to last paragraph in Section B has been added to notify offices at the beginning of each fiscal year that HR will collect the following data: regular work hours, primary work location, and when applicable, multiple work location schedules. The last paragraph in Section B of the policy has been modified to be consistent in the language used in the second paragraph.

		If the temporary assignment results in a pay decrease, as a result of a change to the employee's primary work location, then these requests must be approved by the Chief Administrative Officer. A new section was also added:  All PARs requesting a primary work location change must include the business justification for the change. Justifications must explain how the planned work location change will improve service delivery to judicial branch entities as well as any cost implications (e.g., leased office space). All PARs must be approved by the Chief Administrative Officer prior to any actual change in primary work location.
4.3	Salary Administration	The policy now states that all requests for salary offers above the minimum of the range must be requested by office leadership for approval by the Chief Administrative Officer or designee. The Chief Administrative Officer will make the final determination of the salary level for each individual request based on the criteria in this section. Furthermore, if a step increase is denied or deferred, the Pay and Benefits Administration Unit must be immediately notified in writing of the decision not to grant the step increase. If the step increase is deferred, the supervisor of the affected employee may grant the deferred step increase at a date not to exceed 12 months from the original step increase review date.
4.4	Hours of Work (Exempt and Nonexempt)	Section A of the policy now requires the Chief Administrative Officer to approve any regular work schedule starting earlier than 7 a.m. or later than 9 a.m. It also requires offices to maintain a current record of every employee's approved work schedule and to submit to HR. Offices should also submit any updates to HR if a change is made to an employee's schedule. Section B of the policy now states that employees must also obtain approval from their supervisor for all planned absences--either for a full or up to half-day duration. Section C has additional language to clarify that full-time, nonexempt employees are expected to be assigned to 40 hours per week. Section C (1) of the policy now states that direct supervisors or managers, in lieu of office leadership, can approve overtime work.

		Office leadership, however, should verify all overtime submitted within their office. The changes to the policy also state that, once employees reach the 120-hour CTO threshold, they may no longer elect CTO as compensation for overtime until their CTO hours fall back below the threshold. Section C (3) (a) of the policy now states that for employees with more than one regular work location, the regular commute to and from a regularly assigned work location is not considered work time.
5.1	Holidays	Section B (4) of the policy correctly eliminates use of the term "transfer," in the context of reciprocity, when an employee leaves the Judicial Council and becomes employed by a state or judicial branch entity or vice versa.
5.2	Paid Time Off	Section B (3) (a) of the policy now includes the following language: Military emergency leave includes up to 15 days of unpaid leave to spend time with a military member who is on short-term, temporary rest and recuperation leave during deployment. Sections B (5) and Section E of the policy now includes the following language: For any leave of absence, employees must fully utilize all applicable accrued leave prior to being placed on unpaid status. If any additional leave is accrued during the leave of absence, the new leave must also be utilized before the employee is placed on unpaid status. Section B (5) also further clarifies that leave credits donated through the Catastrophic Leave Program may be used during the leave, but it will not extend the employee's leave entitlement. The previous wording used was not as clear. Section 7 (B) of the policy now states the following: The Judicial Council may require an employee to resubmit medical certification. Section B (8) has also been added to the policy:  Maintaining Time Records  Each month when an employee submits the monthly timesheet, the employee must designate any time that related directly to the approved Family Medical Leave.

		All employees, both exempt and non-exempt, are to report approved Family Medical Leave in 15-minute increments (.25 hour). Section E of the policy has been updated to include the following language in the last paragraph:  Personal leave requests should not be used in lieu of medical leaves or medical accommodations.
5.3	Leaves of Absence	Section B (3) (a) of the policy now includes the following language: Military emergency leave includes up to 15 days of unpaid leave to spend time with a military member who is on short-term, temporary rest and recuperation leave during deployment. Sections B (5) and Section E of the policy now includes the following language: For any leave of absence, employees must fully utilize all applicable accrued leave prior to being placed on unpaid status. If any additional leave is accrued during the leave of absence, the new leave must also be utilized before the employee is placed on unpaid status. Section B (5) also further clarifies that leave credits donated through the Catastrophic Leave Program may be used during the leave, but it will not extend the employee's leave entitlement. The previous wording used was not as clear. Section 7 (B) of the policy now states the following: The Judicial Council may require an employee to resubmit medical certification. Section B (8) has also been added to the policy:  Maintaining Time Records  Each month when an employee submits the monthly timesheet, the employee must designate any time that related directly to the approved Family Medical Leave. All employees, both exempt and non-exempt, are to report approved Family Medical Leave in 15-minute increments (.25 hour). Section E of the policy has been updated to include the following language in the last paragraph:

		Personal leave requests should not be used in lieu of medical leaves or medical accommodations.
5.4	Other Time Off	Section C of the policy now clarifies what documents are needed in order for employees to receive paid time off for jury service: Employees providing jury service must submit all court issued certificates of service to receive paid time off. The jury summons is not acceptable as proof of jury service. When employees are required to call in to determine if their presence is required for the jury selection process, they are expected to attend work as normal and should leave only if selected to appear. If there are any specific questions about your current situation, please contact your pay and benefits specialist. Section F of the policy now includes emergency rescue training added by AB 11, and amends Labor Code Sec. 230.4 Section H now expands the definition of "immediate family member" by including the following groups: siblings of spouses or registered domestic partners, and grandparents of spouses or registered domestic partners. Section I of the policy now includes "affected employees may also seek workplace accommodations for their safety while at work, as stated in Equal Employment Opportunity, policy 2.2 (B). # Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive 33

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to report back on the budget and fiscal management measures implemented by the AOC to ensure that the AOC's fiscal and budget processes are transparent.

The Administrative Director of the Courts should develop and make public a description of the AOC fiscal and budget process, including a calendar clearly describing how and when fiscal and budget decisions are made. The AOC should produce a comprehensive, publicly available midyear budget report, including budget projections for the remainder of the fiscal year and anticipated resource issues for the coming year.

SEC Recommendation 6-7

The AOC's fiscal and budget processes must be transparent. The Executive Leadership Team should require the Fiscal Services Office to immediately develop and make public a description of the fiscal and budget process, including a calendar clearly describing how and when fiscal and budget decisions are made. The Fiscal Services Office should be required to produce a comprehensive, publicly available midyear budget report, including budget projections for the remainder of the fiscal year and anticipated resource issues for the coming year. The Chief Administrative Officer should be given lead responsibility for developing and implementing an entirely new approach to fiscal processes and fiscal information for the AOC.

TASK

<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	PENDING: Although various improvements to the Judicial Council's budgeting process have been implemented, additional improvements are still being developed.
<input type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF AUGUST 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

Given that the California State Auditor's JCC (AOC) Audit Report includes findings and recommendations related to internal budget processes, additional time is necessary for staff to compare and consolidate the SEC and CSA recommendations, which along with the budget survey responses, will provide the basis for defining the budget process and development of the budget calendar.

Staff progress has been delayed due to workload associated with the audit of the Judicial Council authorized by the Joint Legislative Audit Committee and conducted by the California State Auditor. Additionally, process and schedule changes related to Department of Finance's implementation of the Financial Information System for California (also known as FI$CAL) have contributed to the delay.

The JCC Finance Office has already implemented various improvements to the JCC budgeting process, but additional improvements are still being developed. JCC staff are also working to implement other fiscal and budget processes, such as improved budget & allocation reports and developing enhanced training options for division/office budget liaisons. As part of this process, the JCC Finance Office staff will confer with other state entities on their respective practices. In addition, the JCC Finance Office will build upon the DOF annual budget development calendar to more fully document the JCC fiscal and budget processes.

Examples of new fiscal and budget processes that have been developed include:

- Improved budget and allocation reports by adding local assistance funds so divisions/offices have a full picture of the budget they are accountable for (as required in Directive 38);
- Providing increased access to reports and financial systems so divisions/offices can more easily access fiscal data; and
- Working to develop enhanced training options for JCC staff to ensure they are equipped with the knowledge and skills to appropriately manage their budgets.

These processes will augment the existing practice of meetings between JCC budget staff and division/office budget liaisons that occur when initial allocations are released at the beginning of each fiscal year as well as the regular communication between these groups.

Targeted improvements included actions such as:

- Budget staff will no longer “zero out” the remaining budget when preparing the monthly Personal Services Report.
- Budget staff will not automatically move salary savings for vacant positions to the unallocated line item in the office’s budget; the funding will remain in the PSR and may be moved at the request of the office.
- Vacant positions are budgeted at mid-step salary (the prior process did not budget for vacant positions until filled).

Additionally, JCC staff will develop and post on the public website a midyear budget report following the release of the Governor's proposed budget in January. This report will include projections for the remainder of the current fiscal year and any anticipated resource issues for the budget year.

The JCC staff will build upon the DOF annual budget development calendar to document the JCC's fiscal and budget processes. Also, the JCC Finance Office staff will confer with state departments to obtain feedback regarding their internal budget development and administration processes, schedules and procedures (see survey) including interaction with the State Controller's Office.

Entities include:

- Department Of Justice State Controllers' Office Board of Equalization
- Department of General Services
- Public Employees' Retirement System
- Caltrans
- Department of Motor Vehicles
- California State University
- Employment Development Department

While many state funded entities utilize the DOF CalSTARS system for accounting and therefore rely on that system to manage data from the SCO, others have their own systems to manage data received from the SCO and accounting functions.

Also, the JCC staff Executive Office brought in an individual with extensive budget experience having worked for the Executive Branch departments and Sacramento Superior Court to evaluate the JCC budget process.

Recommendations include:

- Evaluate the importance of the number of reporting units in each office; Budgets should be set at the sub

- line item level;
- Revisit the requirement for offices to document their consulting and external contracts needs and hold them accountable if there are significant changes during the year that are not explained by some sort of unforeseeable circumstance;
- Over time the budget office should take the lead in forecasting and seek input as needed from the offices.

Recommendations were presented to the JCC Management Council and office budget liaisons for consideration and feedback prior to implementation. The final approved recommended process changes were implemented in FY 2014-15.

Budget staff from the JCC Finance Office and California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) met on September 16, 2015 to review and discuss CDCR's budget systems and processes including fiscal and administrative review tools, monthly budget and other fiscal controls. Additionally, a JCC Budget Change Proposal (BCP) Task Force was formed in August 2015 to develop recommendations and timeline for internal JCC BCP development, review and approval processes. The BCP Task Force (chaired by Ms. Lucy Fogarty, JCC Finance Office Senior Manager) is comprised of staff from Information Technology e, Capital Program, Trial Court Administrative Services, and Court Operations Services who possess both knowledge and experience in developing budget change proposals.

Final report on measures taken to implement a new approach to the budget process by June 2017.

It should be recognized that the administration and maintenance of policies and procedures is an ongoing process of continuous improvement, and although milestones can be achieved, this is an ongoing process

TASK

<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: Finance has implemented targeted improvements to budget and fiscal tracking systems and provides standard fiscal reports for Judicial Council offices and divisions.

Budget expenditure information is readily available via the Oracle financial system to Judicial Council management team members and division/office budget liaisons. Finance staff has worked to develop enhanced budget training to ensure budget liaisons are familiar with available budget tools.

Targeted improvements to budget and fiscal tracking systems include actions such as:

- Budget staff will no longer “zero out” the remaining budget when preparing the monthly Position Services Report (PSR).
- Budget staff will not automatically move salary savings for vacant positions to the unallocated line item in the office’s budget; the funding will remain in the PSR and may be moved at the request of the office.
- Vacant positions are budgeted at mid-step salary (the prior process did not budget for vacant positions until filled).

The FSO has standard fiscal reports available online for each division and office of the council by the 4th workday of each month. Standard reports include:

- Budget By Account Summary
- Unliquidated Encumbrances
- Expenditures by Line Item.

These reports have been available on this timeline since 1996-97. Report access is granted to the employee/s in the division/office/unit designated by management for dissemination within the division/office/unit. These reports are also available online for the Supreme Court and Courts of Appeal on the same timeline.

In addition to existing and enhanced tools, the Fiscal Services Office will confer with state departments to obtain feedback regarding the budget and fiscal tracking systems they have in place to determine what, if any, would provide value if incorporated into current practices.

An update was provided to the Judicial Council at the February 2013 meeting and will be provided annually thereafter upon release of the Governor's proposed budget.

As reported in June of 2013, the Judicial Council is subject to the same informational requirements and timeline dictated by the Department of Finance relative to the state budget development process and related fiscal reporting process. Information about branch revenues, expenditures, and position information submitted to the Department of Finance in conjunction with these processes is posted on the California Courts website for easy reference. More technically complex documents, such as fund condition statements, are published in conjunction with the release of the Governor's proposed budget each January—also available online. In addition, the following standardized Oracle financial reports are available online each month by the 4th workday:

- Budget By Account Summary
- Unliquidated Encumbrances
- Expenditures by Line Item

These reports are simple and easy to read and have been provided monthly since 1996-97.

It is worthy to note that the branch's budget, to include the Judicial Council's, is extremely complex and is comprised of numerous funds supported by state funds, federal funds, and local revenues. Many programs and projects administered by the council are supported by multiple fund sources, some of which aren't provided or otherwise available in conjunction with the annual state budget. As a result, branch fiscal information is inherently convoluted and oftentimes presents significant challenges to communicate or display in a simplified manner so that it's "clearly understandable".

This issue of ensuring that budget and fiscal information displays are streamlined and simplified so they are clearly understandable was also identified in the January 2015 report of the California State Auditor who recommended that the Judicial Council should require council Finance staff to report its budget in a more understandable and transparent manner, and in a manner that readily allows stakeholders and the public to know the full amount of the council's spending. Further, the State Auditor recommended that the council prepare and make public a high-level summary of how the judicial branch's budget relates to the appropriations from the State's budget.

Working with the Trial Court Budget Advisory Committee, and in consultation with the Department of Finance, council staff is evaluating options to more clearly display the council's budget to stakeholders and the public, and to prepare a high-level summary of how the budget relates to the appropriations from the State budget. It is anticipated that activities in response to the State Auditor's recommendation will be fully implemented in the first quarter of 2016.

The Judicial Council’s Finance office currently tracks appropriations and expenditures by fund. As required by Department of Finance and to comply with State of California Legal Basis Accounting, the Oracle financial system maintains all of this information dating back to 1996-97. Additionally, the Judicial Branch display in the annual Governor’s Budget and supporting schedules provide appropriations and expenditures by fund.

Additionally, Finance conducts regular reviews of budget and expenditure information to ensure divisions/offices are functioning within available resources. This includes monthly budget forecasting for the remainder of the fiscal year as well as year-end planning activities. Finance also provides these budget support services to the Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal, and the Habeas Corpus Resource Center.

Finally, after the end of this fiscal year, Finance reviews existing reports and develop a standard yearend summary to facilitate comparative year-to-year funding changes.

Finance is currently working on developing a special budget display that will organize budget information by fund, by position, and by office. This display will be tied to the Schedule 7A as well as including contractor positions - a summary version of the State Controller’s Office detailed Schedule 8 position listing for each department. The information reflected in this schedule is the basis for the “Salaries and Wages Supplement” displayed on the Department of Finance website. It is anticipated that the new budget display will be available the first quarter of 2016 when the Governor’s Budget is released.

The JCC Finance Office staff met with Department of Finance In February 2015 as part of ongoing efforts to identify options that would provide greater clarity between state operations and local assistance expenditures.

Given that the California State Auditor's JCC (AOC) Audit Report include findings and recommendations related to internal budget processes, additional time is necessary for staff to compare and consolidate the SEC and CSA recommendations, which along with the budget survey responses, will provide the basis for defining the budget process and development of the budget calendar.

Staff progress has been delayed due to workload associated with the audit of the Judicial Council authorized by the Joint Legislative Audit Committee and conducted by the California State Auditor. Additionally, process and schedule changes related to Department of Finance's implementation of the Financial Information System for California (also known as FI$CAL) have contributed to the delay.

The JCC Finance Office staff does track expenditures split into those for state operations and local assistance. Local assistance expenditures are tracked by trial court (if an individual trial court directly benefited) and state-wide (for expenditures that benefits more than one trial court). Additionally, beginning in FY 2012-13 $29.134 million of Trial Court Trust Fund were transferred from Local Assistance to State Operations as these funds are administered by the JCC staff to benefit the Trial Courts. State operations expenditure tracking is further broken down by the program and entity specified in each year's Budget Act, including the Judicial Council, Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal (by court of appeal), and Habeas Corpus Resource Center, etc. Also, the JCC's Oracle financial system maintains all of this information dating back to 1996-97. To view how this information is displayed in the Governor's budget, please refer to the attached document detailing the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial budget category section of the state budget (refer to pages 12-37 for information on the branch budget).

With respect to the distribution of administrative costs, JCC Finance Office staff will be evaluating methodologies employed by other state-funded entities to determine which method should be applied at the JCC.

Departments include:

- Department of Justice Department of General Services Department of Motor
- Vehicles Board of Equalization
- California Highway Patrol
- Department of Transportation
- Public Employees Retirement System

Some large administrative costs have been distributed to each office/division for many years. Distributing administrative costs are important particularly in the area of grant funding. The administrative costs or overhead for grant funding is currently calculated yearly but is not distributed across all grants due to the inability of some grants being able to absorb the full-burden of overhead.

JCC Finance Office staff are currently reviewing existing processes and procedures to determine which improvements can be implemented to meet the requirements of this directive. JCC Finance Office staff will work with the state Department of Finance to further stratify expenditures to ensure clarity of how the funds were expended.

Additionally, Budget staff from the JCC Finance Office and California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) met on September 16, 2015 to review and discuss CDCR's budget systems and processes including fiscal and administrative review tools, monthly budget and other fiscal controls.

A final report will be given to council at the April 2016 meeting.

It should be recognized that while milestones can be achieved the administration and maintenance of policies and procedures is an ongoing process of continuous improvement.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive 39

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require that the AOC schedule its budget development and budget administration around the time frames used by all state entities.

SEC Recommendation 8-6

The AOC should schedule its budget development and budget administration around the time frames used by all state entities. Assuming the budget for any fiscal year is enacted by July 1, the AOC should immediately allocate its budgeted resources by fund among programs, divisions, units.

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING:
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: THE JUDICIAL COUNCIL CONTINUES TO BE IN COMPLIANCE WITH STATE BUDGET TIMELINES. COUNCIL STAFF CONTINUE TO MONITOR THE PROCESS TO IDENTIFY AREAS FOR REFINEMENT.

The Judicial Council has been, and will continue to be, in compliance with timelines associated with the state budget development process, budget administration, and fiscal reporting. Despite the conformance to the state budget development and reporting processes, the judicial branch budget is far more complex than most state-funded entities and has additional timelines that differ from how many Executive Branch department/agency/unit budgets are managed. As one example, trial court funding isn't allocated immediately following enactment of the state budget. Instead, the council receives funding allocation and policy recommendations from a budget advisory group--since trial court funding was enacted, this has included the Trial Court Budget Commission, Judicial Branch Budget Advisory Committee, and the Trial Court Budget Working Group and now the Trial Court Budget Advisory Committee--for consideration. In one particularly late budget year, the council wasn't able to act on funding allocations until October--months after the state of the fiscal year. In a typical year given requirements for the legislature to submit an approved, on-time budget to the Governor, the council isn't able to generally act on funding recommendations until late July, pushing initial current fiscal year allocations to mid-August (for July, courts still receive allocations, but are based on estimates).

As part of the Finance's response to this directive, staff has conferred with other state-funded entities regarding their respective internal budget development and administration processes, schedules and procedures including interaction with the State Controller's Office. While many state funded entities utilize the DOF CalSTARS system for accounting and therefore rely on that system to manage data from the SCO, others have their own systems to manage data received from the SCO and accounting functions. These entities include the following:

- Department Of Justice
- State Controllers' Office
- Board of Equalization
- Department of General Services

- Public Employees' Retirement System
- Caltrans
- Department of Motor Vehicles
- California State University
- Employment Development Department

Since this directive was reported as “completed” in June of 2013, Finance has been working on refining the budget change proposal process. The status on this directive remains “completed” but is an area of ongoing review and refinement.

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require that requests for additional resources be presented to the Judicial Council at its August meeting, identify the increased resources requested, and be accompanied by clear statements of the need and use of the resources and the impact on the AOC, as well as the impact on the judicial branch, if any. A cost-benefit analysis should be part of any request and there should be a system to prioritize requests.

Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 have been combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion relating to the development of a cost benefit analysis proposal for the Judicial Council.

Council staff developed guidelines and a process for branchwide projects and other significant initiatives to ensure a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders. This was developed in August 2013.

The proposed "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" include the "Request for Approval of Project Proposal" form. These guidelines require the full documented collaboration of all stakeholders impacted by a project or initiative. The Executive Office has the sole discretion for determining when to utilize the form for branchwide projects and initiatives.

These guidelines were presented to the Judicial Council at the December 13, 2013, council meeting.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

After the guidelines were developed, Court Operations Services contacted Finance because there was a similar process and form for seeking grant opportunities.

It was decided that the forms and guidelines should be merged to be applicable to both cost benefit analysis for major programs and initiatives as well as grant opportunities. The forms were merged for this purpose.

Finance reports that Information Technology also has a cost benefit analysis form that they utilize and that future activities will include working with IT to determine if this form should be merged with the existing guidelines and form.

Finance indicated that this process was designed for use of all branch funds and to-date, there have been no major initiatives and so the process has not been utilized. For other minor funding needs, the council staff has utilized the budget change proposal process. Additionally, it was clarified that although the formal cost benefit analysis is not currently utilized for Court of Appeal funding decisions, it was designed for use for all judicial branch entities.

A discussion was held by E&P where they asked questions about the threshold for when this tool should be utilized. It was explained by SEC members that this grew out of concerns about CCMS and that this would be utilized in those cases where a budget change proposal is not an option and there is the potential for the use of all branch funds.

Executive Summary

The AOC's Chief Administrative Officer and director of the Fiscal Services Offices present this informational report on efforts relating to the various common aspects of Judicial Council Directives 7-13, 21, 40, 91, and 145 (directives), which were combined as part of a broader review and policy discussion pertaining to the application of a cost-benefit/business case analysis for AOC projects.

Background

The Judicial Council approved the directives as recommended by the Strategic Evaluation Committee (SEC) pertaining to the way in which the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) undertakes significant projects and branchwide initiatives. In their report, the SEC observed the following:

“The AOC has failed to plan, manage, and monitor programs in a manner that seeks critical collaboration and input from the courts. The AOC has undertaken significant and

far-reaching programs over the past decade, including CCMS, branch-wide financial systems, court construction and facilities management, and others. The organization has failed to adequately consider fiscal, operational, and other impacts of its programs and projects on the courts. Projects have been undertaken without first conducting an appropriate business case analysis to determine whether they are prudent.”

As noted, the SEC opined that there appeared to be a lack of uniform internal processes, insufficient collaboration, and inadequate analysis associated with large scale endeavors. More specifically, nearly all of the aforementioned directives relate to observations made by the SEC relative to the California Court Case Management System initiative:

“The AOC’s process of planning and monitoring programs and projects has been lacking. These deficiencies are best exemplified by the CCMS project with its lack of budgetary planning, failure of budgetary controls, failure to identify a sustaining revenue source, lack of an initial business case analysis and feasibility study, lack of sufficient court commitment, and failure to openly disclose pertinent information about the project.”

To address these deficiencies, the SEC detailed a recommended approach:

“... The AOC Executive Leadership Team must begin to implement a formalized system of program and project planning and monitoring that includes, at a minimum: a collaborative planning process that utilizes a business case analysis and that includes an analysis of impacts on courts at the outset of all projects; use of workload analyses where appropriate; and development of general performance metrics for key AOC programs that allow expected performance levels to be set and evaluated.”

In developing a response to the directives, AOC staff consulted with other state entities—such as the Department of Finance and CalHR—on their respective processes in an effort to establish a similar approach at the AOC that incorporates an appropriate level of review and cost-benefit analysis for programs and projects initiated by the agency. As one example, staff utilized the state Department of Finance’s Budget Analyst Guide as an initial framework. Specific guide sections, such as Types of Analysis (Attachment A) and Analysis of Issues (Attachment B), were also identified as potential training tools for AOC staff to demonstrate the basic elements of how appropriate fiscal and programmatic analyses are completed. Since the material is general in nature, each office and division would, in theory, be able to use these resources to meet the individual needs of the program, whether it be completing a grant request for federal funds or a budget change proposal, to name a few.

Following the review of external and existing internal processes, AOC staff developed guidelines that seek to ensure that all elements within each of these 10 directives are adequately addressed. These guidelines include a process for the approval of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives, as well as an approach to conduct any necessary cost-benefit analysis. These elements include:

- The input and collaboration of all stakeholders;
- A complete analysis of scope;

- The development of accurate cost estimates and the identification of funding in constant collaboration with the Fiscal Services Office;
- The application of cost and contract controls including monitoring;
- Full documentation of the decision-making processes; and
- Full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

The "Guidelines for the Administration of Branchwide Projects and Initiatives" (Attachment C) have been reviewed and approved by the Administrative Director of the Courts and will be implemented agency-wide, effective the first quarter of 2014. Leading up to the implementation date, the Fiscal Services Office will work with staff from the AOC Center for Judiciary Education and Research to develop an appropriate training curriculum for management team members, budget liaisons, and other applicable staff.

These guidelines address the SEC's recommendation that a cost-benefit analysis should be infused into the AOC's decision-making process and to serve as a guide when considering any new project or program, large scale or otherwise.

TYPES OF ANALYSIS

BCPs or other issues involving a proposed augmentation

1. Have the department or group proposing the augmentation clarify what the problem is. All too frequently problem statements are either missing, too brief or too general to be sufficiently clear and quantifiable, discuss symptoms rather than real problems, or are stated in terms of the solution (e.g., "the problem is we don't have the 14 additional staff we need"). The analyst's role is to find out if there is a public need which is not being addressed, i.e., what is the problem outside of building? Things like crime, pollution, and poverty are possibilities; the lack of staff, microcomputers, and travel funds are not. Moreover, the problem should be quantified as much as possible so that a quantifiable solution can be arrived at. This should address:
  - a. the extent of the problem
  - b. how this varies from a "normal" or acceptable situation
  - c. how many individuals are experiencing the problem
  - d. where this problem is located geographically
  - e. need statements should answer the question "why?"
2. Consider Alternatives for Solving the Problem. Most BCPs provide two: (1) do nothing and (2) accept our proposal. Do not be deterred by the apparent lack of creativity on the part of some. There is more than one way to solve a problem, especially in an era of constantly changing technology. You might consider:
  - a. automation
  - b. program restructuring
  - c. restructuring systems and procedures
  - d. consolidation of functions
3. The Key Element in a BCP (or other Proposal) is Data to justify the resource level being proposed. Most proposals request specific amounts of staff and funds. These requests should be supported by equally specific calculations. To the extent that specificity is lacking, the analyst may be required to fill in the gaps in order to develop a recommendation. Usually, this kind of analysis starts with a zero-augmentation assumption and builds in components as they are specifically justified on an individual basis.

Attachment A

For example, a particular solution may involve several different types of staff in field offices, headquarters management, and in the Administration Division, each developed on a different basis. In summary, in this type of situation we start with zero and add in resources as they are justified by specific calculations. As a general rule, if you cannot understand where the number comes from, do not add it in.

4. If they lowballed the bill analysis, they should live with it in the BCP.

Workload Issues

In past years, departments were usually funded for agreed to workload increases. More often than not, in recent years with severe budget restraints and no or insufficient funds available to meet mandatory requirements, workload often is not funded. Departments are required to redirect resources or find other alternatives. Despite that, workload analysis is an important Finance activity.

1. The key variables in workload issues are:
  - a. the volume of work to be accomplished, generally referred to as workload
  - b. the current staffing level
  - c. the workload completed with current staff
2. The ratio of workload being currently completed to current staff will usually provide a good estimate of the productivity rate. The ratio of the workload to be accomplished to the productivity rate is the number of staff required to complete that workload. Example—CAL/OSHA elevator inspectors will inspect about 27,500 elevators this year for safety requirements. Next year the number will increase to 28,500. Currently there are 40 inspectors. How many are needed for next year?

Answer	27,500	=	687.5	(Number of elevators
			40	(1 inspector can inspect)

Attachment A

$$\frac{28,500}{687.5} = 41.5 \quad \begin{array}{l} \text{(Number of} \\ \text{inspectors)} \\ \text{(needed )} \end{array}$$

Therefore, 1.5 additional inspectors would be justified on a workload basis. Further, there is one clerical staff for every 4 inspectors in the program, so the addition of 1.5 inspectors would justify  $1.5 \times .25$  or 0.4 of a clerical position, for a total of 1.9 PYs.

3. Sometimes it is necessary to pursue additional justification for the volume of workload projected, depending on historical patterns. Also there may be ways to increase current productivity rates without adding staff by changing procedures or by automating certain functions. The workload calculations should be performed only after the analyst is satisfied with the data that goes into those calculations.
4. Never accept a duty statement as workload justification. Anyone can fill up 40 hours per week with activities. This has no relationship to the external workload, how it is changing, and what staffing implications it has.
5. Workload may fluctuate throughout the year. Our policy is usually not to staff a unit for peak workload demands (with the possible exception of temporary help funds where warranted, such as the Franchise Tax Board), but rather to support staffing to process the average workload level.
6. Workload standards are useful if they have been validated and we have agreed to them. Departments should be encouraged to develop them. Even if this hasn't been done prior to writing the BCP, it may be possible to use time sheet and other activity data to put together some useful standards. But be careful, before proceeding, apply the workload standards to last year's work. Does the analysis show it would require 20 PYs to do the work that you know they did with 10 PYs?
7. Be careful of backlog statistics. There is a difference between backlog and a working inventory. A backlog measurement should exclude:
  - a. workload which is currently being processed

Attachment A

- b. workload which can be processed in a reasonable or statutorily required length of time
- c. workload which has been set aside because it is incomplete, waiting for additional information, or otherwise cannot be processed.

ANALYSIS: Principles and Practices for DOF Analysts

A. What is Analysis?

Analysis is the process by which issues are separated into their component parts and each part and the interaction among the parts are systematically investigated. Later the components of an issue are put back together in a logical way to support a conclusion and recommendation.

You can also think of analysis as the process by which we attempt to answer such questions as follows, regarding a proposal, activity, program or process.

- Who or what is affected?
- What is/are the effects?
- How and when does/will it operate?
- How much does/will it cost?
- Who is raising the issue or making the proposal, and why?
- How might the problem/issue be resolved?

And the final question upon completing an analysis should always be: "Does this make sense?"

B. Typical Types of Finance Analyses

Finance uses the analytic process to develop recommendations on budget proposals, legislation, and other initiatives and issues that may financially impact the State. Preparing solid recommendations is the foundation for our advisory role to the Governor's Office and our role in representing the Administration.

1. Fiscal - Finance's primary role is to provide analyses of fiscal issues or problems. To that end, we review budget change proposals, legislation, initiatives, regulations, and reports to analyze fiscal impacts. Fiscal analyses answer such questions as: How much will (or should) this proposal or program cost (or save) the State? How much revenue will it generate?
2. Policy – While not our main role, Finance staff may also perform policy analysis such as when reviewing legislative proposals. Policy analysis is intended to help decision-makers make choices about governmental programs and governmental regulation of individuals and organizations. Policy analysis focuses on such questions as: What is the likely impact of this policy on the public in general, and on specific groups or organizations? Policy analysis can be done from the perspective of known priorities and policies, or without such political preconditions.
3. Policy combined with fiscal—Most often Finance's analyses include a combination of fiscal and policy issues. For example, Finance analysts review a Budget Change Proposal to assess the reasonableness of the estimated fiscal impacts but also assess the proposed policy objective in relation to the Administration's priorities. The resulting recommendation thus may indicate that the proposed funding augmentation (or reduction) should be modified depending on whether the policy objective is deemed to be of high or low priority by the Administration. The recommendation may also suggest an option that provides a lower (or higher) level of attainment of the policy objective, including arguments supporting that level.

Sometimes the deadline for an analysis is so short that the analysis must be “quick and dirty” and largely based on assumptions since time is not available to gather more information. In these cases it is helpful if the assumptions can be based on historical information or on data from a similar program or activities. In other cases (such as when asked to prepare “Issue Memos”), Finance may have time to prepare a more expansive analysis.

For more details on some of the specific types of items analyzed at Finance, see Bill Analysis, and BCPs, Writing Effective.

C. Steps in Analysis

Academics identify various analytical approaches, which can generally be summarized into six basic steps. (See Analysis, Policy, and Problem Solving for a detailed summary of various analytical approaches.)

1. Define the Problem

- Clearly identify the stated issue/problem. Is there really a problem? Sift through extraneous material to identify the real, underlying problem or need (which may not be the same as the stated issue or problem).
- How big is the problem? Quantify, if possible.
- How did the problem arise? When? What perpetuates it? Outline the history of the issue/problem.
- Who and/or what does the problem impact? When? What are the current laws, regulations and/or programs addressing the problem?

2. Gather Information

- Consider: What do you need to know to define and analyze the issue/problem, and to recommend a solution? How much time do you have?
- Ask questions (repeatedly if necessary) to get the information needed. Also be conscious of and respect others' time and workload constraints, however.
- Be skeptical. Challenge the sources; don't assume the information is correct. Try to verify it or test it against other information to determine its accuracy or reasonableness.
- Think through varied viewpoints on the issue (not just the Administration's current perspective). Talk to both proponents and opponents to gain additional political and programmatic insights.
- Ask follow up questions.
- If you cannot get the information you want in the time (or from the sources) available, can you make assumptions to work around it or develop rough estimates? Document the basis for your assumptions.
- Look at other previous analyses/studies of the issue.
- Note that if the time is late (after 5 p.m.) or short (“quick and dirty” analyses) you still may be able to contact the Legislative Analysts' staff, legislative committee staff, (or for bills, the author's or sponsor's office, too) for some information, even if the department staff are not available.

3. Consider Alternatives

- What are all the feasible options? Consider for example, taking no action; altering an existing law, regulation, process, or program; creating a new law or program, etc.

Attachment B

- What can government do (e.g., mandate, regulate, subsidize, create incentives, tax, provide information, privatize), and what might be effective in this situation?
- What other programs (public or private) or laws (state or federal) address this problem?
- What have other states done to address this problem?
- What has Finance recommended on this type of issue in the past?
- Should the State be involved at all?

4. Determine Criteria for Evaluating Alternatives

Examples of criteria:

- Efficiency - Cost-benefit, cost effectiveness, productivity
- Equity - Is it fair? Who gains, who loses? By how much?
- Effectiveness - Will it solve the problem? How much will it solve?
- Feasibility - Legal, administrative, political (e.g., the current political environment)
- Uncertainty and risk - What could go wrong? How costly? How likely?
- Priority for funding given current state fiscal constraints and Administration policies
- Consistency with Administration goals and policies and expectations

5. Evaluate Alternatives

- Measure each alternative against the criteria.
- Weigh the trade-offs (e.g., better service vs. higher cost; lower cost vs. higher risk)

6. Make Recommendation

- Pull the information together to form conclusions, and then make recommendations.
- Be creative. Policy analysis affords opportunities to develop creative compromises and unique solutions to address problems. Although Finance is not a "think tank," we can occasionally be the source of new policy ideas.
- Anticipate the Administration. Try to recommend at least one option likely to be preferred by the Administration (based on what you know of the current policies and priorities).
- Recommend more than one feasible alternative for the decision-makers to consider (e.g., in times of limited funds recommend the preferred activity and funding level, and some feasible lower level).
- Review your analysis and ask if it all "makes sense." Can a reader follow the logic from the problem identification through the alternatives to the recommendation?
- Check to see how critical any information (both included and omitted) is to the recommendation.
- Critique and supplement (or pare down) the information as needed.

D. Communicating Your Analysis

To be effective, an analysis must be clearly communicated to the decision-makers and other interested parties.

1. Types of Presentations

- Oral presentations in meetings
- Budget change proposal (BCP) write-ups
- Bill analyses
- Legislative testimony

Attachment B

- Press packets or contacts
- Governor's Budget Summary ("A-pages") and other public reports
- Issue Memos
- One-on-one discussion/negotiation with LAO and departmental staff

2. Presentation Style

- Narrow focus. Finance does not typically produce lengthy study reports that thoroughly analyze all aspects of major policy issues. Finance's analyses tend to focus in on the fiscal impacts to state government and, in particular, to the General Fund.
- Related to specific decisions. Our analyses tend to focus on information needed to make a specific decision, and normally will recommend a specific action on an issue.
- Brief and clear. Finance does not get much time to speak its piece; often one or two lead sentences have to carry the presentation.
- Unbiased/nonpartisan, but politically informed. Although we work for the Governor and do analysis in the context of known Administration policy and perspective, Finance staff should be prepared to argue all sides of an issue (e.g., in Administration decision-making meetings). Recommendations on issues should reflect a balance between what might be acceptable to the Administration, and other considerations, including other viewpoints relevant to a decision. (Finance staff should not expect to promote personal political views, however.)
- Original and active. Use active (not passive) voice as much as possible, and state your thoughts without plagiarizing others' analyses (e.g., departments' analyses or documents).
- Professional. Both oral and written presentations should be made keeping in mind our professional staff role.

3. Traditional Biases of Finance

- Low cost/high benefit
- Proven effectiveness
- High priority
- Fundable by redirection of existing resources
- Consistent with Administration goals

4. Other Considerations

- Preparation. Finance staff are some of the main spokespersons for the Administration, and as such are expected to be able to explain and defend the Administration's position (e.g., on budget proposals) before the Legislature and in answering press calls. Be sure your analysis is adequate to support and defend the recommendations.
- Audience. Be aware of who reads and/or needs the information, and focus the presentation to address their level(s) of knowledge. Give adequate information to understand the issue and recommendation.
- Timing. Be sensitive to whether a decision maker can be receptive to a proposed policy and whether the issue's time has come. Often we are not the best organization to raise an issue; it may be better raised by agency/department staff or others with policy-making

authority.

- Respect for hierarchies. Finance staff should understand and respect the hierarchy of Finance and of other departments and agencies we work with. It is important to differentiate the positions that may be taken by various levels in a department and the degree to which top management has (or has not) approved a particular position.
- Flexibility. The Administration may decide on a different option that you recommend. Be ready and willing to revise your analysis to further detail the selected option, and/or reframe the issue, if necessary.
- Disassociation. Although it can be hard to do, Finance staff should not let themselves get too personally committed to policy recommendations they make or view nonacceptance as a "personal defeat."

E. Developing Policy Analysis Skills/Knowledge

The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of your program/subject areas; the issues; and State processes, priorities, and fiscal constraints. The following are some tips on the sources and types of information you should gather (an ongoing process), and how to manage your time to complete analyses.

1. Sources of Information.

Following are some suggested sources and methods for developing your policy understanding and analytical skills. You will be engaged in many of these activities in the course of your work, but take advantage of slow moments for further research and discussion of policy issues in your area.

- Read texts, articles, books, and analyses done by others (e.g., scholars, advocates, the Legislative Analyst, Bureau of State Audits)
- Learn the history (e.g., talk to or review written work of your predecessors on the assignment)
- Listen to others who already know the programs and issues well (e.g., talk with department staff when reviewing various documents)
- Discuss issues with advocates and constituents
- Take field trips to visit program staff and projects in the field
- Learn by doing (jump into your assignment!)

2. Areas of Knowledge

- a. Program Knowledge. The foundation for any analysis is a thorough working knowledge of the program being addressed. No analytical technique can replace basic information about how the program works. Such knowledge typically includes: the program's purpose, who and how many it serves, what it provides, how services are delivered, the current costs, criteria for expending the funds, how the program evolved (e.g., what were key decision points in program's history), and the trends in terms of revenues, expenditures, staffing, and workload data.
- b. Knowledge of the State's current fiscal situation and constitutional constraints. Less than ten percent of the budget is discretionary. Some of the key factors limiting State expenditures are: the State Appropriations Limit (SAL), Proposition 98, other Constitutional requirements, entitlement programs, statutory COLAs, and legal obligations. Other constraints not set in the Constitution or statute but which are as, or nearly as, restraining, include: General Fund revenues, General Fund reserves, federal budget actions directly affecting the State's budget, tax expenditures, public safety expenditures, revenue-producing activities, and budget agreements.

In analyzing budget issues, it is important to keep these factors in mind and know where we are relative to the major constraints. This will tell you whether we have some flexibility and can entertain discretionary proposals, or whether we're going to have to recommend reductions.

- c. Knowledge of other Administration and Department of Finance Priorities. Current State policies and priorities (such as those outlined in the Governor's Budget Summary or Budget Highlights, or the State of the State Address) need to be taken into account when analyzing an issue. Examples of recent State priorities include: (1) reducing personnel years (PYs); (2) reducing General Fund expenditures; (3) attempting to help the federal government reduce the federal deficit; (4) reforming welfare; and (5) making the State more competitive. Awareness of these policies helps analysts to frame questions and recommendations.
- d. Knowledge of the Issue. Besides general program knowledge, specific information about the issue being addressed is important to understanding proposed changes. For example, analysts may prepare by researching the history of issues in their program area, why the issues are (re)emerging, views of proponents and opponents, and what this and other states are doing to address the issues.

3. Managing Your Analytical Time and Effort

- Get started early. Size things up. Decide when you need to start each task in order to meet your deadline. Set a mental schedule (allowing for slippage).

Tell the department what information you need right away. Put requests in writing (e.g., by email) when possible to confirm conversations and avoid misunderstandings later. Set a deadline for receipt of this information which is early enough so that you can ask for clarification, or request other information if this raises additional questions.

- Follow up. Think about the information as it's being presented to you. Is it filling in the gaps? What gaps remain? Take the initiative to ask follow-up questions and probe when talking to department staff. It is relatively rare that your first set of questions will elicit all of the information necessary for an analysis. Keep thinking of what you need to resolve the issue.
- Stay on Course. Don't lose sight of your objective and deadline, or get sidetracked. Make sure you understand what's central to the issue, and that you're getting the information you need from department staff (i.e., what's relevant, not what's easy for them to give you). Periodically, review where you are relative to your objectives and schedule. Make mid-course corrections as necessary. Raise problems to a higher level in DOF or the line department, as appropriate.
- Stop when you have what you need or you have all you can get in the time available. In the latter case, qualify your analysis by indicating the conclusions are based on the limited information available and noting any assumptions made.

- Get feedback. Brainstorm ideas with your supervisor and peers. Discuss your findings and conclusions with your managers and with the department. Run drafts of your analysis and recommendations by your managers in advance of the deadline to get their input early.
- Critique your own work. Check and double check your calculations. Review your analysis to see if there are further logical gaps that need to be filled in. See if your factual information is correct, and if your argument holds up to criticism. Revise your analysis if necessary.
- Keep records. Keep your notes, supporting data obtained, and calculations made in a file for reference. (You'd be surprised how quickly people forget how they arrived at certain numbers!)
- Be sensitive to other workload demands on staff with whom you are working. You will likely need their assistance and cooperation in the future. Nevertheless, if they won't give you the information for any of the following reasons:
  - Because they've been appointed by the Governor
  - They told the last analyst they had
  - The last analyst they had didn't ask for this type of information
  - It's not Finance's role
  - They wouldn't ask for funding if they didn't need it
  - They're stalling
  - The Governor wants this done
  - You don't have the professional qualifications
  - The Director already agreed to this

you'll have to recommend disapproval of their request for lack of justification. Tell your supervisor of the situation and discuss how to resolve it.

Policy Statement:

Unless contrary direction is provided by the Judicial Council, the initiation of branchwide projects and other significant initiatives shall be preceded by a full and comprehensive cost-benefit analysis that includes the input and collaboration of all stakeholders, a complete analysis of scope, accurate cost estimates and funding streams and associated controls, documentation of the decision-making processes, and the full transparent consideration of fiscal, operational, and other impacts to the courts and stakeholders.

Overview:

The following guidelines have been established to assist with the preparation of formal project proposals. They seek to implement a comprehensive process of programmatic and fiscal analysis that ensures all costs and benefits are considered before a decision is made regarding whether to proceed with a proposal within the Judicial Branch.

Process:

1. Issue or Concept Identification:
  - Offices/divisions identify issue or concept (e.g., initiating new programs, expanding existing programs, creation of new requirements on branch entities, requesting federal or state grants, etc.)
  - Office Director holds preliminary discussions with Division Chief
  - Division Chief and Office Director present the issue to the Executive Office as an informal concept
  - Executive Office determines depth of analysis required and assigns the issue or concept to the appropriate Office/Division for further evaluation.
  - Executive Office determines if consultation with Judicial Council or the Executive and Planning Committee is necessary based on factors such as funding needs, scope of effort, and policy issues.

2. Preparation of Request for Approval of Project Proposal (RAPP) Form
  - The RAPP, prepared in accordance with these guidelines, must be approved for every project prior to the encumbrance or expenditure of funds on the project, including use of staff resources on implementing the project.
  - The RAPP establishes the business case for investment of branch resources in the project by setting out the reasons for undertaking the project and analyzing its costs and benefits, absent contrary direction from the Judicial Council.

- The Fiscal Services Office will conduct training for staff involved in the completion of the RAPP form, with an emphasis on the Cost Considerations section, upon request.
  - Participation in the web-based training titled Analytical Thinking for Analysts available through the California Department of Human Resources is encouraged: <http://www.calhr.ca.gov/Training/Pages/index-analytical-thinking-for-analysts.aspx>
- Components of the RAPP Form
    - a. Requesting Office or Division
    - b. Date Prepared
    - c. Contact Information
    - d. Project Title
    - e. Summary
    - f. Summarized Estimated Costs
    - g. Proposal Review Routing
    - h. Associated JC Strategic Goal, if applicable
    - i. Project Scope
    - j. Stakeholders
    - k. Impact Analysis
    - l. Documentation of Decision-Making Process
    - m. Cost Considerations
    - n. Authorization to Proceed (Office Director or Designee)
3. The RAPP form should be forwarded to the appropriate Division Chief for review and approval only after all issues raised by internal review have been addressed.
  4. Briefing of Executive Office by Division Chief/Office Director
    - Consider routing to appropriate Judicial Council committee (such as the Executive and Planning Committee) or Judicial Council
    - Consider discussion with Chief Justice
    - Consider discussions with external stakeholders such as the courts or State Bar
  5. Executive Office Action
    - If issue or concept was identified within the AOC, approve, disapprove, or return to applicable office for further examination.
    - If issue or concept was identified by the Judicial Council, respond to the Judicial Council as directed with recommendation or act as directed by the Judicial Council.

Council Directive 41

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require that, after the Governor's Budget is released in January, the AOC should present a midyear update of the judicial branch budget at the next scheduled Judicial Council meeting. All figures provided by the AOC should tie back to the Governor's Budget or be explained in footnotes.

SEC Recommendation 8-8

After the Governor's Budget is released in January, the AOC should present a midyear update of the judicial branch budget at the next scheduled Judicial Council meeting. This presentation should tie to the figures in the Governor's Budget so that everyone has the same understanding of the budget.

As reported in April 2013, Finance staff reported that they presented a midyear update on the judicial branch budget at the January 2013 Judicial Council meeting. This update has also been provided at the January 2014 and January 2015 Judicial Council meetings.

Updates will continue to be provided as necessary as developments occur in the budget process. For example, an update is typically provided after the release of the Governor's May Revision. This includes statewide conference calls with Administrative Presiding Justices, Presiding Judges, Court Executive Officers, and Appellate Court Clerk/Administrators.

Finance has also implemented processes to ensure all numbers tie to the Governor's budget or can otherwise be explained.

Fiscal Services will continue its practice of providing information on the Governor's budget to both the council and to trial court leaders. ## Council Directive 42

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require that, except for budget changes that must be made to comply with time requirements in the state budget process, the AOC not change the numbers in the budget statements it presents. All figures provided by the AOC must tie back to the Governor's budget or be explained in footnotes.

SEC Recommendation 8-9

Except for changes that must be made to comply with time requirements in the state budget process, the AOC should not change the numbers it presents – continual changes in the numbers, or new displays, add to confusion about the budget.

The Judicial Council adheres to state fiscal reporting guidelines, some of which require reported numbers to be adjusted after initial submission. As an example, encumbrances initially reported as expenditures may be less if the contract amount was not fully utilized. As a result, prior year expenditure numbers would need to be revised. As another example, the Governor's own budget has reported numbers that change three times in the course of several months (Governor's January budget, May Revision, enacted budget).

For those instances where revisions are required, appropriate documentation will occur. Generally, though, reported numbers will not change unless such changes are dictated by state fiscal reporting guidelines.

In addition, the Administrative Director will propose a briefing calendar to advise the Judicial Council of any adjustments to previously reported numbers submitted by the AOC as part of the state budget development/fiscal reporting process.

Working with the Trial Court Budget Advisory Committee, and in consultation with the Department of Finance, council staff is evaluating options to more clearly display the council's budget to stakeholders and the public, and to prepare a high-level summary of how the budget relates to the appropriations from the State budget. It is anticipated that activities in response to the State Auditor’s recommendation will be fully implemented in the first quarter of 2016.

Audit Services (AS) balances its audit activities between the branch and the Judicial Council based on staffing availability. Historically, AS had an authorized staff high of 17 positions and actual of 15 positions in Fiscal Year (FY) 2006-2007 and has a current authorized and actual staff of 14 in FY 2014-2015. These staffing levels do not reflect the external audit contract that was in place from FY 2001-2002 through FY 2012-2013 that provided up to six supplemental auditors.

With its staffing, Audit Services as specified in its Annual Audit Plan conducts superior court audits, internal audits of the Judicial Council, and non-audit consultative work as requested and approved. The primary focus of the AS work at the Judicial Council has been in high risk areas such as facilities where AS has audited the work of the external facilities maintenance vendors and capital construction. AS continues to perform work in this area and in FY 2014-2015 it plans on initiating audits in facilities areas including the: 1) review of the capital program change order process 2) documentation and operational process concerning the delegated facilities maintenance program; 3) Computer Aided Facilities Management (CAFM) system for logical and physical security access controls and data integrity testing; and 4) Court Facilities Architecture Revolving Fund established under Government Code Section 70379.

Other AS internal audit work at the Judicial Council planned for fiscal year 2014-2015 includes: 1) Review of certain general and application controls over Oracle Financials including: (a) data integrity testing of information in the database used for decision making purposes and financial reporting; (b) logical and physical access controls to the system; and 2) Review of the overall logical access to the Judicial Council's network as a follow-up to the CSA audit of December 2013.

Significantly impacting the audit plan for fiscal year 2014-2015 are external audits of the Judicial Council and non-audit consultative work requested and approved by executive management. AS work is subject to change based upon changes occurring in the Judicial Branch and within the Judicial Council. The Executive Office of the Judicial Council can also review and request work based upon these changes that will affect the Annual Audit Plan for fiscal year 2014-2015 with trade-offs if new work is prioritized.

Beyond 2014-2015, AS will work with the Executive Office to continue to identify and include internal audit activities for those offices believed to have higher risk profile (i.e., accounting functions, Phoenix financials, etc.) as part of its future audit plans while balancing this workload with audit services provided to the superior courts.

In June of 2015, a Technical Advisor was brought in to review the current AS program and provide recommendations that will enhance the program and increase efficiency in the programs day-to-day operations. It is anticipated that this review will be completed June 2016 and as such, it is requested that the timeline be modified to read "Judicial Council Administrative Director to report to the council at the June 2016 council meeting".

JUDICIAL COUNCIL DIRECTIVES
DIRECTIVE NUMBER 43
STATUS AND AUDIT PLAN FOR 2014-2015

Judicial Council Directive

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director to perform internal audits upon completion of the restructuring of the Judicial Council.

SEC Recommendation

The Judicial Council must perform internal audits. This will allow the leadership team and the Judicial Council to know how a particular unit or program is performing. An audit can be both fiscal and programmatic so that resources are tied to performance in meeting program goals and objectives.

Background Regarding the Audit Function

The audit function is an integral part of the State of California's public sector governance. Audit units in numerous state departments provide management with an independent and objective assessment regarding the:

- Responsible and effective use of public resources.
- Achievement of objectives and the mission of the organization.
- Improvement of government operations to increase effectiveness and efficiency thereby reducing cost.
- Deterrence and detection of fraud and abuse of resources.
- Assurance of accountability, transparency, and integrity.

The role and importance of the auditors and the internal audit process in state government appears to continue to be growing. The auditor's expertise is called upon by management for technical advice, effective risk assessment (see attached summary of risk categories utilized in an assessment), sound business processes and internal controls, program evaluation, and other areas related to effectiveness, efficiency, and economy of operations, and reporting.

The Legislature deemed auditing to be so important, that it enacted Government Code Section 1237, requiring that state agencies with aggregate annual spending of $50 million or more establish an ongoing audit function. Recent legislation added Government Code Section 13885 et. seq. to focus attention again on the importance of audit activities, with provisions that ensure the independence of internal auditors. These provisions also recognize that findings of internal auditors must be reported to the appropriate levels of government to safeguard public funds and the public trust.

When the Judicial Council (formerly the Administrative Office of the Courts) restructured organizationally in October 2012, Audit Services (AS) was moved from reporting to the Director of Finance (Finance) to reporting to the Chief of Staff. This organizational change addressed the independence issue of Government Auditing Standards (GAGAS) as issued by the United States Government Accountability Office (GAO). An impairment of independence would occur if AS would conduct an audit of any function of Finance while it reported to Finance. That impairment would also be considered to exist for any office of the Administrative Division that reports to the Chief Administrative Officer (CAO) if it reported to the CAO.

AS's charter approved by the Judicial Council in February 2004 included a mission statement that reads:

The mission of Audit Services is to assist the Judicial Council and its staff agency, the Judicial Council, and all members of the judicial branch in the effective and efficient discharge of their administrative and operational responsibilities.

AS has fourteen staff consisting of a senior audit manager, two audit supervisors, four senior auditors, six audit staff, and an administrative coordinator. One senior auditor works exclusively on construction and facility audits and consultative engagements in those areas. All audit engagements either planned or requested begin with objectives, and those objectives determine the type of work to be performed and the auditing standards to be followed. The types of work, as defined by their objectives that are covered by GAGAS are classified as (see detail descriptions attached to this report):

- Financial audits (including financial statement non-opinion and financial accounts);
- Performance audits (based on standards or metrics to evaluate performance) that includes compliance audit work;
- Operational audits; and
- Non-audit consultative services/engagements or reviews (including revenue distribution).

Engagements may have a combination of objectives that include more than one type of work as described above or may have objectives limited to only some aspects of the type of work. AS also is responsible for the Whistleblower Hotline for the Judicial Branch and the investigative work and reporting associated with it, and responding to technical accounting, audit, and operational questions utilizing its expertise and experience. AS also is involved in Judicial Council internal audits and non-audit consultative work in the construction and facility maintenance areas with its one auditor.

AS's routine work at the superior courts is considered more comprehensive than any one type as it combines financial, operational, and compliance testing. The compliance testing covers specific statutes, aspects of California Rules of Court, and the Trial Court Financial Policies and Procedures Manual (FIN Manual). The operational work includes testing in cashiering, information systems, security, etc. The financial work includes testing of financial accounts and transactions.

AS continues to perform comprehensive audits of the superior courts on a routine basis with a schedule of 8 to 10 done annually (6 to 7 year cycle) with an increased risk approach to testing and scope reductions having been instituted recently. This is down from the previous 4 year cycle that existed prior to budget cuts. Additionally a significant amount of work recently for the superior courts has been in the non-audit consultative and special projects area by IAS.

Public Contract Code Section 19210 requires procurement and contract audits to be performed by the California State Auditor for five judicial branch entities biennially and the Judicial Council in the alternate year. AS will evaluate the work being performed and its timing in the determination of its scope of work in the branch to maximize efficiency and effectiveness, reduce impact on the auditees, and minimize costs.

Status Discussion and Audit Plan

AS balances its audit activities between the branch and the Judicial Council based on staffing availability. Historically, AS had an authorized staff high of 17 positions and actual of 15 positions in Fiscal Year (FY) 2006-2007 and has a current authorized and actual staff of 14 in FY 2014-2015. These staffing levels do not reflect the external audit contract that was in place from FY 2001-2002 through FY 2012-2013 that provided up to six supplemental auditors.

With this staffing, AS conducts superior court audits on a regular cycle that has been extended from a four year to a six year cycle. AS also performs a significant amount of non-audit consultative work and technical accounting, operations, and advisory work in the superior courts. Working with the Court Executive Advisory Committee and as part of its evaluation of risk, AS has reduced the scope of testing in certain low risk audit areas of the superior courts during the last two years and will continue to evaluate the potential for scope reductions. Additionally, other external audit work also is reviewed to determine adjustment to audit scope in the superior courts such as:

- California State Auditor (CSA) work in procurements and contracts in the pilot courts and the five judicial branch entities it will review biennially.
- State Controller court revenue audits that cover distributions of the case management systems.

The audit plan for the superior courts for FY 2014-2015 includes the completion of three court audits from the prior year and the initiation of eleven. The eleven planned to be initiated subject to change are:

- Yolo (in progress)
- San Luis Obispo (in progress with an increased scope of the Tyler Odyssey system for accuracy of distributions)
- San Bernardino (in progress)
- Humboldt
- Fresno
- Kern
- Contra Costa
- Kings
- Tulare
- Ventura
- Merced

Follow-up activity of incomplete audit issues from audit reports issued and accepted by the Judicial Council also continues to be performed to monitor to completion the correction of the issues based primarily on management's representations. Certain audit activities in this area may include actual visits and requests for documentation to support corrective activities.

AS also has been performing internal audits of the Judicial Council for the last few years in addition to evaluating the work of external auditors to determine scope and areas of audit as resources allow. AS also provides non-audit consultative assistance and technical advice to Judicial Council staff. The primary focus of the AS work at the Judicial Council has been in facilities where AS has audited the work of the external facilities maintenance vendors and capital construction. AS continues to perform work in this area and in FY 2014-2015 it plans on auditing facilities areas including the:

- Documentation and operational process concerning the delegated facilities maintenance program;
- Computer Aided Facilities Management (CAFM) system for logical and physical security access controls and data integrity testing; and
- Court Facilities Architecture Revolving Fund established under Government Code Section 70379.

Significantly impacting the audit plan for fiscal year 2014-2015 are external audits of the Judicial Council and the A&E Advisory Committee activities that have recently been performed or are in process. AS has been involved in the work and will evaluate it as part of its on-going risk assessment and work plans. These activities included:

- CSA's audit of the procurement and contracts of the Judicial Council with the report issued in December 2013.
- CSA's current audit of the Judicial Council's administration of funds, budget for administration, and staffing.
- The A&E Advisory Committee's review of Judicial Council's contracts for compliance with Judicial Council policy as reported to the Judicial Council in August 2013.
- The Department of Finance financial audit of the significant and material funds under the administration, control, and jurisdiction of the Judicial Council to be started in October 2014.

Other AS internal audit work at the Judicial Council planned for fiscal year 2014-2015 includes:

- Review of certain general and application controls over Oracle Financials including:
  - Data integrity testing of information in the database used for decision making purposes and financial reporting.
  - Logical and physical access controls to the system.
- Review of the overall logical access to the Judicial Council's network as a follow-up to the CSA audit of December 2013.

As contemplated, AS work is subject to change based upon changes occurring in the Judicial Branch and within the Judicial Council. The Executive Office of the Judicial Council can also review and request work based upon these changes that will affect the plan for fiscal year 2014-2015 with trade-offs if new work is prioritized.

Beyond 2014-2015, AS will work with the Executive Office to continue to identify and include internal audit activities for those offices believed to have higher risk profile (i.e., accounting functions, Phoenix financials, etc.) as part of its future audit plans while balancing this workload with audit services provided to the superior courts.

To provide the council with an update on council internal audit activities, it is requested that the timeline for this directive be modified to read: Judicial Council Administrative Director to report to council at the February 2015 council meeting.

Risk Categories Utilized In A Risk Assessment

1. Publicity risk

Arises from negative public opinion which may affect the ability to establish new relationships or services and to maintain existing ones. Risk exposes the organization to possible litigation, financial loss, or damage to reputation with the associated negative impact on public perception.

2. Strategic risk

Arises from adverse business decisions or improper implementation of those decisions. Risk is a function of the compatibility of an organization's strategic goals, the business strategies developed to achieve those goals, the resources deployed, and the quality of implementation. The resources are tangible and intangible and include: communicating, operating systems, delivery networks, and managerial capacity and capability. Strategic risk must ensure appropriate incorporation of community needs and concerns to alleviate adverse public perception of the organization.

3. Operational/transactional

Arises from problems with service or product delivery, internal controls, information systems, and operating processes.

4. Compliance

Arising from violations of, or non-compliance with, laws, rules, regulations, prescribed practice, or ethical standards. Also arises in situations where the laws or rules governing certain activities of the organization's clients may be ambiguous or untested. The exposure here is contracts voided, fines, diminished reputation, etc.

5. Financial/ fiscal

Arises from inaccurate or improper accounting or reporting of financial transactions in financial accounts (general ledger) and reports, and in budget development, monitoring and reporting.

6. Security

Arises from the failure to properly restrict and secure access to computer systems and court buildings, or areas. (Logical and physical security considerations.)

7. Human Resource

Arises from the failure to adequately promote an environment of employee integrity and ethical standards, and to ensure proper licensing, where necessary, on-going applicable training, responsibilities are explicit and delegation is within scope and an appropriate level of management/supervision.

Types of Audits

All audit engagements begin with objectives, and those objectives determine the type of work to be performed and the auditing standards to be followed. The types of work, as defined by their objectives that are covered by Generally Accepted Government Auditing Standards (GAGAS), are classified in this site as financial audits, performance audits, operational audits, attestation engagements, and consulting services/engagements or reviews. Engagements may have a combination of objectives that include more than one type of work described previously or may have objectives limited to only some aspects of one type of work.

- Financial audits
- Performance audits
- Operational audits
- Attestation engagements
- Consulting services/engagements or reviews
- Special Investigations

Financial audits - Financial audits are primarily concerned with providing reasonable assurance about whether financial statements are presented fairly in all material respects in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP), or with a comprehensive basis of accounting other than GAAP. Other objectives of financial audits, which provide for different levels of assurance and entail various scopes of work, may include:

1. Providing special reports for specified elements, accounts, or items of a financial statement;
2. Reviewing interim financial information;
3. Issuing letters for underwriters and certain other requesting parties;
4. Reporting on the processing of transactions by service organizations; and
5. Auditing compliance with regulations relating to federal award expenditures and other governmental financial assistance in conjunction with or as a by-product of a financial statement audit.

Financial audits are performed under the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants' (AICPA) generally accepted auditing standards for field work and reporting, as well as the related AICPA Statements on Auditing Standards (SAS). GAGAS prescribe general standards and additional field work and reporting standards beyond those provided by the AICPA when performing financial audits.

Performance audits (nonfinancial audit) entail an objective and systematic examination of evidence to provide an independent assessment of the performance and management of a program against objective criteria as well as assessments that provide a prospective focus or that synthesize information on best practices or cross-cutting issues. Performance audits provide information to improve program operations and facilitate decision-making by parties with responsibility to oversee or initiate corrective action, and improve public accountability.

1. Performance effectiveness and results audit objectives address the effectiveness of a program and typically measure the extent to which a program is achieving its goals and objectives.
2. Economy and efficiency audit objectives concern whether an entity is acquiring, protecting, and using its resources in the most productive manner to achieve program objectives.
3. Program effectiveness and results audit objectives and economy and efficiency audit objectives are often interrelated and may be concurrently addressed in a performance audit.
4. Internal control audit objectives relate to management's plans, methods, and procedures used to meet its mission, goals, and objectives. Internal control includes the processes and procedures for planning, organizing, directing, and controlling program operations, and the system put in place for measuring, reporting, and monitoring program performance.
5. Compliance audit objectives relate to compliance criteria established by laws, regulations, contract provision, grant agreements, and other requirements that could affect the acquisition, protection, and use of the entity's resources and the quantity, quality, timeliness, and cost of services the entity produces and delivers. Compliance objectives also concern the purpose of the program, the manner in which it is to be conducted and services delivered, and the population it serves.

Attestation engagements (example Agreed Upon Procedures Reviews, AUPR's) concern examining, reviewing, or performing agreed-upon procedures on a subject matter or an assertion about a subject matter and reporting on the results. The subject matter of an attestation engagement may take many forms, including historical or prospective performance or condition, physical characteristics, historical events, analyses, systems and processes, or behavior. Attestation engagements can cover a broad range of financial or nonfinancial subjects and can be part of a financial audit or performance audit. Possible subjects of attestation engagements could include reporting on:

1. An entity's internal control over financial reporting;
2. An entity's compliance with requirements of specified laws, regulations, rules, contracts, or grants;
3. The effectiveness of an entity's internal control over compliance with specified requirements, such as those governing the bidding for, accounting for, and reporting on grants and contracts;
4. Management's discussion and analysis (MD&A) presentation;
5. Prospective financial statements or pro-forma financial information;
6. The reliability of performance measures;
7. Final contract cost;
8. Allowability and reasonableness of proposed contract amounts; and
9. Specific procedures performed on a subject matter (agreed-upon procedures).

Attestation engagements are performed under the AICPA's attestation standards, as well as the related AICPA Statements on Standards for Attestation Engagements (SSAE). GAGAS prescribe general standards and additional field work and reporting standards beyond those provided by the AICPA for attestation.

Consulting services/engagements or reviews. Audit organizations also provide non-audit services that are not covered by GAGAS. Non-audit services generally differ from financial audits, attestation engagements, and performance audits in that auditors may:

(1) perform tasks requested by management that directly support the entity's operations, such as developing or implementing accounting systems; determining account balances; developing internal control systems; establishing capitalization criteria; processing payroll; posting transactions; evaluating assets; designing or implementing information technology or other systems; or performing actuarial studies, or

(2) provide information or data to a requesting party without providing verification, analysis, or evaluation of the information or data, and therefore, the work does not usually provide a basis for conclusions, recommendations, or opinions on the information or data.

These services may or may not result in the issuance of a formal report but may be in the form of an audit memorandum. In the case of nongovernment auditors who conduct audits under GAGAS, the term non-audit services is synonymous with consulting services.

GAGAS does not provide standards for conducting non-audit services, auditors providing such services need to ensure that their independence to provide audit services is not impaired by providing non-audit services.

Council Directive    44

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require that the leadership team must develop and employ budget review techniques so that the budget of an individual unit is aligned with its program responsibilities.

SEC Recommendation    8-11

As part of the reorganization and downsizing of the AOC, the leadership team should employ budget review techniques (such as zero-based budgeting) so that the budget of an individual unit is aligned with its program responsibilities. In the future, there should be periodic reviews of units and or programs to make sure funding is consistent with mandated requirements.

In 2013, the Judicial Council’s Executive Office retained an individual with extensive departmental budget experience with both the judicial and executive branch to undertake a review of Finance’s budget and forecast processes. Recommendations included:

- Establishment of an internal spring budget development process that would include meetings with council offices to identify major items of expense for the upcoming year, program priorities and resource needs;
- Review and evaluation of significant changes in expenditure patterns that compares current year and prior fiscal years;
- Changes to improve the timeliness and accuracy of the forecast process.
- Shift lead responsibility for the forecast process over time to the JCC Finance Office with input as needed from the offices.

The recommendations were presented to the council’s Management Council and office budget liaisons for consideration and feedback prior to implementation. Budget and forecasting recommendations from this effort were received were implemented in July 2014. These process improvements along with periodic reviews of individual council offices' budgets provide the framework upon which budget allocations are based beginning in FY 2014-15 as well as a structure for ensuring that unit budgets are aligned with program responsibilities.

Following the Judicial Council’s determination of staff services and workload priorities Finance will work with the Executive Office to align individual units with their program responsibilities.

Council Directive 45

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts that the total staff size of the AOC must be reduced significantly and must not exceed the total number of authorized positions. The consolidation of divisions, elimination of unnecessary and overlapping positions, and other organizational changes should reduce the number of positions.

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to require that staffing levels of the AOC be made more transparent and understandable. Information on staffing levels must be made readily available, including posting the information online. All categories of staffing — including, but not limited to, authorized positions, “909” staff, employment agency temporary employees and contract staff — must be accounted for in a manner understandable to the public.

SEC Recommendation 9-1

The total staff size of the AOC should be reduced significantly.

SEC Recommendation 9-2

The total staff size of the AOC must be reduced significantly and should not exceed the total number of authorized positions. The current number of authorized positions is 880. The consolidation of divisions, elimination of unnecessary and overlapping positions and other organizational changes recommended in this report should reduce the number of positions by an additional 100 to 200, bringing the staff level to approximately 680 to 780.

SEC Recommendation 9-5

The staffing levels of the AOC must be made more transparent and understandable. Information on staffing levels must be made readily available, including posting the information online. All categories of staffing—including, but not limited to, authorized positions, “909” staff, employment agency temporary employees and contract staff—must be accounted for in a manner understandable to the public.

x	COMPLETED: Since the directive was provided in August of 2012, the council has made significant staffing reductions over the last three years. Reductions of authorized filled positions, agency temporary employees and contractors had been reduced from 1,121 to 780.51 as of February 28, 2015.

Since the directive was provided in August of 2012, the council has made significant staffing reductions over the last three years.

Between February and August of 2012 staffing levels were reduced due to layoffs, two offerings of Voluntary Separation Incentive Program, retirements, and a reduction in temporary workers and contractors.

Reductions of authorized filled positions, agency temporary employees and contractors had been reduced from 1,121 to 780.51 as of February 28, 2015.

To address the concern that staffing levels needed to be more transparent and understandable a new report was subsequently developed and is included as an element in the Administrative Director's report titled the 'Staffing Report'. Staffing Reports are also posted to the courts.ca.gov website and are updated monthly. The report includes data and definitions for the types of staffing and total workforce numbers reported for council staff.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

The council continues to monitor the staffing levels and has been focused on ensuring that staffing never exceeds a cap of 805 positions.

Additionally, the council continues to look at staffing levels and particularly at the services that are provided to ensure that the council is appropriately staffed to provide the services our customers require.

In 2013, the council continued with organizational review efforts as part of two-phased Essential Services Organizational Review Project that was especially necessary in light of the staffing reductions to ensure that the council was still able to provide services with reduced staffing.

The first phase of this project included creating a catalog of all of the services provided by council staff as a foundation for further analysis and organizational review. A report titled Services Provided by Judicial Council Staff was presented to the Judicial Council at its June 2014 meeting.

After issuance of this report, it was envisioned that Phase 2 would include additional activities in regards to developing customer service surveys to identify the services that should be provided and then estimating the resources needed for the services identified and the subsequent staffing.

With the issuance of the report from the California State Auditor, there is even greater focus on what was envisioned for Phase 2 of the Essential Services Review and it is anticipated that within the next two years analysis will be conducted and the organization should be able to finally determine the appropriate level of staffing (overstaffed or understaffed) and/or if there should resources moved within the organization to focus on other projects or programs. Whether the organization's staffing should decrease further will depend upon the outcome of this effort and may in fact result in evidence that support increasing staffing in certain areas.

Definitions:

Authorized Position (FTE) Authorized positions include all regular ongoing positions approved in the Budget Act for that year. The number is based on the position's approved full time equivalency.

Filled Authorized Position (FTE) Filled authorized positions are the number of authorized positions filled based on the employee's full time equivalency.

Headcount The actual count of persons employed by the Judicial Council, regardless of FTE. This number could be more than the FTE count due to part-time employees being counted as "1". This count does not include Judicial Council Temporary Employees (909) or Employment Agency Temporary Workers.

Vacancy (FTE) The number of vacancies is the number of authorized positions minus the number of filled authorized positions.

Vacancy Rate (FTE) Vacancy Rate is calculated by dividing the number of authorized positions by the number of vacant authorized positions. This number excludes temporary employees ("909" funded employees). See definition of temporary employees below.

Judicial Council Temporary Employees (909) The "909 category is the State Controller code used to reference a temporary position or a temporary employee.
909 Position - it is a position that may not be funded through the Budget Act and it is categorized by the Office of the State Controller as a temporary position used in the absence of an authorized position. 909 positions may be occupied by regular full-time employees due to the unavailability of an authorized vacant position. 909 Employee - An employee whose salary is not funded through the Budget Act. 909 employees may receive benefits if employed at least half-time and the term of employment is for more than six months. Types of "909" Temporary Employees include: Retired Annuitants: A retired annuitant is a retiree who is hired by his or her former employer or by another employer that participates in the same retirement system as the former employer. This includes a former participant in a state retirement system who has previously retired and who is currently receiving retirement benefits. Temporary: Employees employed on a temporary basis - they do not receive full benefits (but do receive CalPERS retirement service credit).

Employment Agency Temporary Worker (FTE) These are workers from an employment agency. They are employees of the employment agency that provide short-term support.

Contractor (FTE) Individuals augmenting the work of the organization and providing services for a limited period of time or on a specific project, where a particular skill set is required that is either (1) not within an existing classification and/or job description or (2) where recruitment issues require the use of a contractor.

Full Time Equivalency (FTE) Full Time Equivalency is the number of total maximum compensable hours designated in a year divided by actual hours worked in a year. For example, the work year is defined as 2,080 hours; one employee occupying a paid full time job all year would consume one FTE. One employee working for 1,040 hours each would consume .5 FTE.

Time Base Full time: Employee is scheduled to work 40 hours per week. Receives full benefits.
Part time: Employee is scheduled to work less than 40 hours per week. Employees that work more than 20 hours per week receive full benefits.
Intermittent: Employees have no established work schedule and work on an as-needed basis that varies from one pay period to the next. Eligibility for certain benefits may be limited for these employees.

Regular Employee Commonly referred to as "permanent employees" – They receive full benefits.

Limited Term Limited Term Position – It is a position that is funded through the Budget Act with a specific end date. The position is counted as an authorized position. Employee in limited term positions may be regular or temporary.

Council Directive 46

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to report to the Judicial Council vacant authorized positions if they have remained unfilled for six months.

SEC Recommendation 9-3

Vacant authorized positions should be eliminated if they have remained unfilled for six months.

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: Human Resources have developed a vacancy report that provides information on positions that have been vacant for longer than six months.

As reported in October of 2012, the Judicial Council Human Resources office developed a vacancy report that provides a report of vacant authorized positions available to the council. The report provides a listing of positions that have been vacant for six months or longer. This report is currently used when recruitments are requested and approved through the Executive Office as the oldest vacant position number is used for the recruitment. It should be noted that although there are position numbers that have been vacant for longer than six months, this is not necessarily an indication of a flawed process and instead reflects that for a long period of time there was no hiring occurring at all. Also, the council initiated a cap of 805 positions and so these positions remain vacant until there is a verified and approved need for the position.

Executive and Planning Commission (E&P) members requested that the Judicial Council review the existing number of vacant positions and try to eliminate some of these positions that have remained vacant for a period of time to more closely align with funding available.

Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive 47

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to ensure that the employment of temporary or other staff to circumvent a hiring freeze is not permitted. The Administrative Director must review all temporary staff assignments and eliminate those that are being used to replace positions subject to the hiring freeze. Temporary employees should be limited to periods not exceeding six months and should be used only in limited circumstances of demonstrated need, such as in the case of an emergency or to provide a critical skill set not available through the use of authorized employees.

SEC Recommendation 9-4

Employment of temporary or other staff to circumvent a hiring freeze should not be permitted. The Executive Leadership Team should immediately review all temporary staff assignments and eliminate those that are being used to replace positions subject to the hiring freeze. Temporary employees should be limited to periods not exceeding six months and should be used only in limited circumstances of demonstrated need, such in the case of an emergency or to provide a critical skill set not available through the use of authorized employees.

TASK

<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	COMPLETED: The Judicial Council has established guidelines to further restrict the use of agency temporary workers across the organization.

The AOC has established guidelines to further restrict the use of agency temporary workers across the organization. Effective July 1, 2013, agency temporary staff can only be utilized under three circumstances:

- 1) The temporary assignment must be identified as a short-term (less than six months), critical, project-based assignment, not backfilling a vacant position.
- 2) The temporary assignment is backfilling an approved extended leave of absence and the position is supporting a critical core function.
- 3) The agency temporary worker is backfilling a position supporting a critical core function while the approval to conduct recruitment for the position is going through the council exemption process. The maximum duration for these assignments is three months.

Agency temporary worker assignments have a maximum duration of no more than six months and shall not continue past June 30 of each fiscal year, regardless of the assignment start date, without granting a request to extend.

If the assignment begins less than six months before June 30, the requesting office may formally request to extend the assignment beginning on July 1. The total timeframe the agency temporary worker may be on assignment with the council shall not exceed six months.

The Chief Administrative Officer is required to review and approve any requests to employ a temporary worker for longer than six months. Additionally, there is an extensive criteria that must be met prior to the review by the Executive Office who review each and every request.

IMPLEMENTATION PROGRESS AS OF MARCH 2015

<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED WITH NO FURTHER ACTION REQUIRED/NEEDED	<input type="checkbox"/>	UNABLE TO IMPLEMENT
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED AND ONGOING	<input type="checkbox"/>	PENDING IMPLEMENTATION
<input type="checkbox"/>	IMPLEMENTED BUT IN PROGRESS

The ongoing review of requests to hire agency temporary employees as well a review of the duration of the assignments will continue as needed by the organization. Additionally, cost benefit analysis will now be utilized prior to hiring a temporary worker or contractors in response to a recommendation from the California State Auditor.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

As of April 30, 2013, the AOC had 30.5 agency temporary workers, compared to a peak of 141 in fiscal year 2010-2011. As of March 2013, this number has decreased to 8 agency temporary workers.

In its audit report dated January 7, 2015, the of the California State Auditor recommended that council implement a policy that requires it to conduct a cost-benefit analysis for using temporary workers, contractors, or consultants instead of state employees before employing temporary workers, contractors or consultants to do the work of AOC employees.

Judicial Council Personnel Policy 3.3–Job Categories was modified to include a requirement that prior to retaining a temporary worker council staff must conduct both a cost-benefit and critical-need analysis. “Temporary worker” includes temporary agency workers and independent contractors. The policy includes an annual reporting mechanism to the Judicial Council. Guidelines for conducting the cost benefit analysis are being developed and will be applied retroactively to existing temporary agency and independent contractors. The council anticipates that this recommendation will be fully implemented in the third quarter of 2015.

Additionally, the California State Auditor recommended that council follow its policies and procedures limiting the period of time it can employ temporary workers, and develop a similar policy to limit the use of contractors to a reasonable period of time, but no more than one year.

Judicial Council Personnel Policy 3.3–Job Categories was amended to specify that temporary agency workers may not exceed six-months in duration, and independent contractors may not exceed one year in duration unless preapproved by the Chief Administrative Officer and/or Administrative Director. To ensure that the Judicial Council has adequate information, the policy includes an annual reporting mechanism to the governing body for any exceptions.

AOC Utilization of Agency Temporary Employees

Historical Information

The Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) currently utilizes a single-vendor master contract, with low negotiated rates, to provide agency temporary staffing services. The AOC's practice of using a primary, contracted vendor has been in place since 1999. The Human Resources Services Office (HRSO), through its master contract, monitors agency temporary usage, controls costs and oversees the temporary staffing process.

In February 2008, when a limited number of recruitments were permitted, hiring managers began to employ an increased number of agency temporary staff to offset increasing workloads brought about by a lack of staffing resources. Agency temporary usage at the AOC hit its peak at 141 temporary assignments during fiscal year 2010-2011. During this time, the approval to employ an agency temporary worker was at the discretion of the Division Director and Executive Office.

Recent Use of Agency Temporary Employees

Beginning in late 2012, the AOC began to reduce its reliance on agency temporary staff and took the first steps by converting 32 temporary staff to regular employee positions.

MONTH	COUNT
12-Apr	82.0
12-May	71.0
12-Jun	56.0
12-Jul	55.0
12-Aug	54.0
12-Sep	51.0
12-Oct	51.2
12-Nov	47.1
12-Dec	17.5
13-Jan	20.5
13-Feb	24.5
13-Mar	26.5
13-Apr	30.5

In January 2013, HRSO, in conjunction with the Chief Administrative Officer, further restricted the process by implementing new parameters for securing agency temporary workers funded through the master contract. These parameters include:

- The temporary assignment must be less than six months in length, critical, and established on a project-only basis; or

The temporary assignment is backfilling a position in which the incumbent is on an approved extended leave of absence and only if the position is supporting a critical core function.

Before the agency temporary worker is funded through the master contract, the request must be reviewed by HRSO to determine if one of the above criteria is met.

Next Steps

While the need for agency temporary staffing exists, it is the goal of the AOC to implement stringent guidelines to decrease its dependence on agency temporary workers for long-term assignments.

These guidelines have been outlined in the attached document. The guidelines contain three requirements to determine whether an agency temporary worker may be brought on an assignment. It also includes up to a six-month maximum timeframe that agency temporary workers may remain on assignment.

In addition to addressing concerns raised by Judicial Council Directives 47 and 140, the maximum six-month timeframe was implemented to avoid a temporary agency worker potentially applying for California Public Employees Retirement System (CalPERS) membership under the common law employment factors. One of the requirements for CalPERS membership eligibility is that an individual must work more than 1000 hours, or equivalent to six months, for a state agency or state contracting agency.

The AOC will inform staff and apply these standards beginning July 1, 2013. The AOC will continue to assign HRSO oversight and enforcement responsibilities.

The AOC recently completed the solicitation of a new vendor to manage the agency temporary program. Effective, July 1, 2013, the AOC will initiate a master contract for use by the state judicial branch. In prior years, the master contract was limited to only the AOC. Under the new master contract, the Supreme Court, the Courts of Appeal, AOC, Habeas Corpus Resource Center, and the Commission on Judicial Performance will now be able to utilize agency temporary workers under a single contract.

Agency Temporary Worker Guidelines and Procedures

These guidelines and procedures outline criteria for the use of agency temporary workers as a reasonable resource to address staffing needs, provide guidance on how to complete the exemption request form, and provide assistance for the supervision of the agency temporary workers if the agency temporary worker request is granted.

I. DEFINITION

Agency temporary workers are not employees of the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC). An agency temporary worker is an employee of an external employment agency; agency temporary workers receive compensation directly from the employment agency and carry out specific assignments. They are not eligible for any AOC benefits (sick leave, vacation, paid holidays, retirement, training, service credit, compensatory time, and transit passes, etc.), salary increases, reclassification or shift differential pay.

Agency temporary workers are hourly employees and must be paid for all hours worked, including overtime pay pursuant to applicable state and federal laws.

Agency temporary workers are not granted preferential treatment based on their temporary assignment with the AOC if they apply for an AOC employee position.

An agency temporary worker may be considered for employment as an AOC employee after working the minimum hours as governed by the current AOC Master Temporary Staffing Services Contract. All agency temporary workers must meet the minimum qualifications of the AOC classification in order to be considered for employment.

II. DURATION OF AGENCY TEMPORARY WORKER ASSIGNMENTS

Agency temporary worker assignments have a maximum duration of no more than six months and shall not continue past June 30 of each fiscal year, regardless of the assignment start date, without granting a request to extend.

If the assignment begins less than six months before June 30, the requesting office may formally request to extend the assignment beginning on July 1. The total timeframe the agency temporary worker may be on assignment with the AOC shall not exceed six months.

III. TYPES OF AGENCY TEMPORARY WORKER ASSIGNMENTS

1. Short-Term, Project-Based Assignments typically involve assistance on a special project (i.e., not for regularly assigned work).

Under short-term, project-based assignments:

- The agency temporary worker is not backfilling a position vacancy due to a planned separation or retirement;
  - The agency temporary worker receives compensation based on contracted rates in the Temporary Worker Salary Classification Schedule, as defined in the AOC Master Temporary Staffing Services Contract;
  - A former agency temporary worker may begin work on a new assignment with the AOC after a six-month break; and
  - No individual who retired under the California Public Employees' Retirement System (CalPERS) may work for the AOC as an agency temporary worker within 180 days of retirement.
2. Backfilling an approved Extended Leave of Absence is allowable when the incumbent is on an approved extended leave of absence and the incumbent supports an AOC critical core function.

Under backfilling of approved extended leave of absence assignments:

- The agency temporary worker is not backfilling a position vacancy due to a planned separation or retirement;
  - The agency temporary worker receives compensation based on contracted rates in the Temporary Worker Salary Classification Schedule, as defined in the master agreement;
  - A former agency temporary worker may begin work on a new assignment with the AOC after a six-month break; and
  - No individual who retired under CalPERS may work for the AOC as an agency temporary worker within 180 days of retirement.
3. Backfilling a Position Vacancy involves the use of an agency temporary worker to backfill a position that has been identified as supporting an AOC critical core function. Under backfilling a position vacancy assignments:
    - The agency temporary worker is backfilling the position while the approval to recruit for the position is being determined.

- The agency temporary worker receives compensation based on contracted rates in the Temporary Worker Salary Classification Schedule as defined in the master agreement;
- The agency temporary worker's assignment for back filling a vacancy has a maximum duration of no more than three months.
- A former agency temporary worker may begin work on a new assignment with the AOC after a six-month break; and
- No individual who retired CalPERS may work for the AOC as an agency temporary worker within 180 days of retirement.

IV. CRITERIA FOR REQUESTING AN AGENCY TEMPORARY WORKER

Before an agency temporary worker request is considered for approval, the requesting office should clearly demonstrate that:

- a. The agency temporary worker is an essential staffing need for a project-based assignment, with a duration of no more than six months, and the specific work assignment cannot be performed by regular employees;

OR

- b. The agency temporary worker is backfilling a position supporting a critical core function when the incumbent is on an approved extended leave of absence. The maximum duration of six months is still applicable, regardless of the incumbent's time on leave.

OR

- c. The agency temporary worker is backfilling a position supporting a critical core function while the approval to conduct recruitment for the position is going through the AOC exemption process. The maximum duration for these assignments is three months.

V. PROCEDURE FOR REQUESTING AN AGENCY TEMPORARY WORKER

Offices must submit an exemption form to request an agency temporary worker. The Chief Administrative Officer ultimately has approval authority over all requests for agency temporary workers.

To submit a request for an agency temporary assignment, the requesting office must complete the following two forms and provide them to the Human Resources Services Office (HRSO):

1. Request for Exemption - Temporary Help (link)
2. Temporary Agency Work Order (link)

HRSO reviews the forms to ensure that the criteria for an agency temporary worker assignment have been met and that all sections of the exemption and work order forms have been accurately completed.

If the request successfully meets the criteria, HRSO forwards the forms to the Chief Administrative Officer for final approval. HRSO then informs the requesting office of the Chief Administrative Officer's decision. Under all circumstances, HRSO initiates contact with the agency; requesting offices may not directly contact the agency or prospective agency temporary workers.

VI. PROCEDURE FOR TERMINATION OF ASSIGNMENT OF AN AGENCY TEMPORARY WORKER

Hiring managers should contact HRSO before communicating assignment terminations with an agency temporary worker. HRSO will contact the agency temporary worker's employment agency and then provide guidance to the hiring manager on next steps.

VII. OFFICE PROCEDURES FOR AGENCY TEMPORARY WORKERS

The office requesting an agency temporary worker is responsible for determining cubicle space, securing a phone with Business Services, and computer and network setup with the Information Technology Services Office HelpDesk.

VIII. AOC SUPERVISOR RESPONSIBILITY

Only AOC employees in classifications designated as supervisor or above may serve as the "supervisor" of the agency temporary worker, with tasks such as:

- Approving weekly timecards;
- Approving any needed travel and lodging expenses and/or following AOC policies and procedures;
- Establishing guidelines regarding worker expectations and conduct (as long as they are reasonable and do not conflict with the AOC agency temporary guidelines); and
- Communicating and enforcing AOC safety practices.

  - (3) Intermittent

  - (2) Independent Contractors or Outside Consultants

(A) Purpose of Policy

This policy sets forth the employment classifications to guide employees about their employment status and benefit eligibility.

(B) Regular and Limited-Term (Temporary) Employment

(1) Regular Status

Regular employees are those employees in Judicial Council positions that receive renewed funding each fiscal year.

(2) Limited-Term (Temporary) Status

Limited-term employees (also known as temporary employees) are hired by the Judicial Council for a particular project or for a limited duration. Funding for this type of position is generally scheduled to end on the last day of the fiscal year, or the appointment may be authorized only for a specific period of time. Some limited-term positions may be extended beyond the initial expiration date if funding is available. Other categories of temporary employment include the following:

- “Special consultant,” “graduate student assistant,” and “student assistant” are specifically designated temporary classifications (the special consultant classification is generally applied to individuals who work on special projects that require particular expertise). Appointment to these positions is limited to a specific period of time, which is typically the length of a project or, in the case of graduate student assistants and student assistants, through the end of a school term.
- Retired persons may return to work as “retired annuitants” on a temporary basis as long as they do not work beyond 960 hours in any fiscal year. For more information about requirements and restrictions on the appointment of retired annuitants, please refer to Policy 3.11(B).

Limited-term employees may not be eligible for certain benefits. For more information about eligibility for benefits, please refer to Employee Benefits, Chapter 6.

(C) Time Base

In addition to having a regular or limited-term status, all employees are designated with a full-time, part-time, or intermittent time base.

(1) Full Time

“Full time” means that the employee is scheduled to work a minimum of 40 hours per week.

(2) Part Time

“Part time” means that the employee is scheduled to work less than 40 hours per week. The term “ratio to full time” is used to describe a part-time employee’s time base and refers to percentage of time, relative to a full-time schedule, that an employee is regularly scheduled to work. Examples of less than full-time employment include four-fifths time, half time, etc. An individual who is scheduled to work less than half time may not be eligible for certain benefits. For more information about eligibility for benefits, please refer to Employee Benefits, Chapter 6.

(3) Intermittent

“Intermittent” means that the employee has no established work schedule and works on an “as-needed” basis. The number of hours that an intermittent employee works often varies from one pay period to the next. Cumulative hours for intermittent employees must not exceed 1,500 per calendar year. Eligibility for certain benefits may be limited for intermittent employees; please refer to Employee Benefits, Chapter 6 for more information.

(D) Exempt and Nonexempt Status

“Exempt employees” are employees who are classified by the Judicial Council as exempt from the overtime provisions of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). “Nonexempt employees” are employees who are eligible to be compensated for overtime work in accordance with the FLSA. Overtime pay provisions are set forth in Hours of Work, policy 4.4.

(E) Other Temporary Workers

Temporary agency workers or independent contractors (also known as outside consultants) may be retained by the Judicial Council on a temporary basis.

(1) Temporary Agency Workers

Human Resources maintains contracts with approved temporary employment agencies to provide short-term support. The duration of a temporary agency worker is dependent upon the purpose of the assignment.

The Chief Administrative Officer may grant exceptions to the duration limitation for agency workers for extreme circumstances affecting or impacting critical operations.

(2) Independent Contractors or Outside Consultants

These individuals are employed by an outside firm, are self-employed, or are a group of individuals established as a business to provide expertise and services in a specialized field. An independent contractor must satisfy IRS regulations defining independent contractor status.

For more information on retaining a temporary agency worker, please contact Human Resources. For more information about the requirements governing independent contractors, please refer to the Judicial Branch Contracting Manual.

Temporary agency workers and independent contractors or consultants are not Judicial Council employees. If such workers are interested in employment with the Judicial Council, they must follow the guidelines for external applicants as outlined in Hiring, policy 3.1\(A\).

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts, as part of the council's long-term strategic planning, to evaluate the location of the AOC main offices based on a cost-benefit analysis and other considerations.

A series of real estate transactions resulted in an expense reduction of nearly $8.6 million in rent and a space contraction of 82,761 SF (25%) through FY 2014-15. These were subsequently approved in fulfillment of Directive 22, which represents the initial phase implementation of Directive 48.

The California State Auditor's (CSA) January 7, 2015 report on the Judicial Council includes a recommendation that the Judicial Council conduct a cost-benefit analysis (CBA) on the consolidation of its branch headquarters and its office in Burbank with its operations in Sacramento. Council staff has completed gathering pertinent facilities, lease, human resources and market data, drafted a set of comparative financial analyses on alternative scenarios, including the assumptions and methodologies used. The pros/cons of significant but non-quantifiable considerations are currently under development.

The JC will implement this Directive through long-term evaluation of the location of the AOC main offices. The CBA is currently under development with the assistance of an outside Technical Advisor and is scheduled for completion in the fourth quarter of 2015. Other considerations under the Directive are yet to be defined, as is the placement of the Directive within the Council's long-term strategic planning.

Effective October 1, 2012, the directive that CFCC no longer be a stand-alone division, was changed as part of a new organizational structure that was approved by the Judicial Council. This new structure reduced the JCC Executive Team to four positions (Administrative Director, Chief of Staff, Chief Operating Officer, and Chief Administrative Officer) and realigned and renamed existing divisions into offices housed under one of three newly created divisions (Judicial Council and Court Leadership Services Division, Judicial and Court Operations Services Division, and Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division). As part of the new structure, CFCC was moved under the Operations & Programs Division, under the leadership of the Chief Operating Officer (currently vacant) consistent with the directive.

Additionally, on August 21, 2015 the JCC completed its Classification and Compensation Study that resulted in the implementation of a new salary structure for the organization. The compensation phase of the project followed the classification portion of the study that began in December 2013 and ended in March of 2015, when JCC staff

In October 2013, former Administrative Director Steven Jahr presented to the Judicial Council a report which reviewed the staffing reductions taking place within the Center for Families, Children & the Courts office beginning in 2011 and ending in July 2013. During that timeframe, the office reduced their overall staff by 35 percent.

The compensation phase of the project followed the classification portion of the study that began in December 2013 and ended in March of 2015, when JCC staff received their new classification specifications. As a result of the comprehensive review of the classification system, the number of classifications was reduced from 184 narrow classifications to 83 broad classifications. Staff were allocated into the new classification structure based on their regularly assigned duties and responsibilities.

Through restructuring and position review since July 2013 combined with the classification and compensation review, as of September 1, 2015 there are 53 employees in CFCC, of which 19 are in the attorney classification. The current numbers reflect an overall reduction in staff of 46% since the initial review. Additionally, it represents a 34% reduction in attorneys assigned to CFCC during this same time period.

Research Communications and Coordination Protocol

Introduction

The Judicial and Court Operations Services Division employees staff in research classifications in three of its offices. The researchers in those offices work on multiple assignments in different program areas, including family law, juvenile law, self-help and access to justice, tribal programs, mental health, collaborative justice, criminal justice court services, judicial and staff workload modeling, resource allocation modeling, historical filings trends in the trial courts, use of subordinate judicial officers, the impact of trial court unification, and research projects mandated by new legislation.

Overall, the AOC's research staff has decreased by approximately 45% in recent years. In order to optimize the effectiveness of the new organizational structure—under which all researchers have now been grouped in the same division—and to maximize the efficient use of remaining staff, the following formal protocol for communications and coordination of research resources has been developed. The protocol was developed in lieu of consolidating all research staff within a single office within the division because of the unique nature of the work typically done by researchers in each office. That is, researchers in the Office of Court Research (a part of the Court Operations Special Services Office) typically engage in wide-scale, “project”-style research, such as recent work on judicial and staff workload models, as well as the resultant work on models for allocating fiscal resources to the trial courts. By comparison, researchers in the Center for Families, Children & the Courts and the Criminal Justice Court Services Office have subject matter expertise in particular case types or operations (e.g. family, juvenile, domestic violence, tribal, criminal justice, collaborative justice, civil representation pilots). This subject matter expertise increases efficiencies in our efforts to work both within the judicial branch and AOC and in the work with external partners. These researchers conduct research as subject matter experts in multi-disciplinary teams, serving trial courts in projects such as caseload management, outcome measurement, implementation of legislative mandates and assessment of their costs and benefits to trial courts at the local level.

Protocol

1. An email distribution list for all AOC researchers will be established to ensure that information of interest to all is shared easily, and that the various court groups that staff works with receive information that may be of interest to them across all research projects. In addition, AOC analysts and others may use the group to keep abreast of the division's research projects.
2. Managers and supervisors from each office will meet as needed—but at least every two months—to review current and proposed research projects, staffing and other resources; and to consider ways to provide additional assistance to the courts and meet needs for research at the AOC. Regular topics on the agenda will include:

- Review information requests from the trial and appellate courts to ensure prompt response;
- Review new requests for research assistance from the trial and appellate courts and AOC leadership; provide division director with options for responding to the request;
- Coordinate requests to the trial and appellate courts for information, including surveys, and minimize burdens on the courts;
- Assess current projects to identify places where efforts could be consolidated and the number of staff required for projects reduced;
- Make recommendations to the division director on changes needed in staff assignments;
- Develop educational resources and information sources for the trial and appellate courts to ensure they have adequate access to information derived from research projects and court statistics;
- Respond to Judicial Council advisory groups with research and information required on their annual agendas.

3. Staff will coordinate on grant proposals, budget change proposals, conference presentations, and other projects to prevent duplication of effort.

Judicial Council Directive #56 CFCC Publications

Directive 56. E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to consider reducing or eliminating various publications produced by the Center for Families, Children, & the Courts.

Corresponding SEC Recommendation No. 7-4: CFCC's current number of authorized positions should be reduced. To achieve the reduction, these areas should be reviewed and considered, and appropriate actions taken: (including)

(g) CFCC staff members produce various publications. They should be considered for reduction or elimination.

Summary

Publications and information resources produced by the Center for Families, Children & the Courts (CFCC) include mandated reports to the legislature, research briefings for judicial officers and court stakeholders, bench guides and other practice guidelines, and content designed for AOC and the California Dependency OnLine Guide (CalDOG) websites. CalDOG, which is used exclusively to access publications, has 2,000 visitors per month. The CFCC pages on the AOC website receive 1,300 visitors per month.

Consistent with the SEC recommendation and the Judicial Council directive, CFCC undertook an effort to reduce, to an absolute minimum, staff and funds used on print publications and to make information accessible through websites and other electronic means. CFCC has also created an information resource development protocol to insure that this change is institutionalized for future publications.

1. Workforce and costs reductions

By streamlining publication development, shortening the material and delivering most of the information through summaries, briefings, and tools on the internet, staff time spent on publications has been substantially reduced. By eliminating most printed publications, the costs of design, editing, and reproduction have also been substantially reduced. Two senior research positions have been eliminated, resulting in a savings of salary and benefits of $234,826. The total amount of Improvement and Modernization Funds supporting CFCC operational costs for publications stood at $122,000 in fiscal year 2010-2011, and at $20,000 in fiscal year 2012-2013, a decrease of 84 percent.

2. Operational Changes

- With the elimination of two senior research analysts, CFCC is no longer conducting research, developing and producing publications on topics related to self-help programs, domestic violence, juvenile delinquency, and many areas of family law including:

program evaluations, briefing and literature reviews on topics requested by Judicial Council committees and other judicial officers. Nearly all research publications are now funded by restricted grants.

- New publications are limited to those developed at the Judicial Council's direction or its approval of the publication on an advisory group's annual agenda. Recent publications are focused on those that directly assist the courts and meet branch objectives. Advisory group members serve on teams that review the plans and drafting of publications.
- Discontinued publications include the Court Adoption and Permanency Resource Guide: A Handbook for California Courts Highlighting Adoption and Permanency Programs; Journal of the Center for Families, Children & the Courts; Improving Coordination of Cases Involving Children and Families, and Juvenile Best Practices Research Briefings.
- Publications, resources, and tools are available online only. CFCC's large conferences, including Beyond the Bench and the Family Law Education Programs, are now paperless. Judicial tools such as the popular guides to foster care eligibility law and research briefs developed to meet a specific need of the court are now available online only.
- Hard copies are made by exception only. An approved justification is required. Currently, the only exceptions are frequently requested by the courts in printed form. These include the popular Children's Activity Book, pocket guides for judges, and the Family Reunification Book. Print publications are now produced in a print-on-demand format and the number of copies is carefully monitored.
- Updates to popular publications have been deferred. These include Every Child, Every Hearing, Applying Collaborative Justice Principles and Practices, and Improving Coordination of Cases Involving Children and Families.
- Existing publications have been repurposed to focus on the immediate needs of judicial officers and other key stakeholders. Information resources are posted as a summary with links to publications developed by other agencies, where available.
- Legislatively mandated publications are produced as efficiently as possible through temporary reassignment of staff or collaboration with other offices. For example, the research and writing for Special Assessment of the Need for New Judgeships in Family and Juvenile Law was carried out in coordination with the judicial needs study and Judicial Council report led by the Office of Court Research, eliminating duplication of effort and greatly reducing staff costs.

Implementation of Judicial Council Directive #59

Judicial Council Directive #59:

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to propose an organizational plan for the Center for Families, Children, & the Courts that allows for reasonable servicing of the diverse programs mandated by statute and assigned to this division.

Corresponding SEC Recommendation:

(j) Although staffing reductions in this division are feasible, any reorganization or downsizing of this division must continue to allow for reasonable servicing of the diverse programs mandated by statute and assigned to this division, including such programs as the Tribal Project program.

Implementation of the Directive

1. Organizational restructuring

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council approved a new organizational structure for the Administrative Office of the Courts proposed by the interim Administrative Director of the Courts and incoming Administrative Director of the Courts. The new organizational structure reduced the AOC Executive Team to four positions (Administrative Director, Chief of Staff, Chief Operating Officer, and Chief Administrative Officer) and realigned and renamed existing divisions into offices housed under one of three newly created divisions (Judicial Council and Court Leadership Services Division, Judicial and Court Operations Services Division, and Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division). The Center Families, Children & the courts is now an office in the Judicial and Court Operations Division. The approved organizational structure became effective on October 1, 2012. As noted in the implementation report describing this restructuring, the new AOC structure realizes efficiencies through consistent oversight, improved communication, streamlined decision-making, and clear designation of authority, responsibility, and accountability.

2. Workforce reductions

Since the conclusion of fiscal year 2011-2012, the workforce of the Center for Families, Children, and the Courts has been reduced by 29 people, a reduction of nearly 30 per cent.<sup>1</sup> The overall savings in salaries and benefits is $3,128,194 and rent in is $491,100. Per funding source, the savings in salaries and benefits is: Admin-General Fund - $785,101; Comprehensive Drug Court Implementation Act (CDCIA) - $80,311; Family Law Trust Fund - $528,107; State Justice Institute (SJI) Grant - $99,053; Federal Court Improvement Grant (Juvenile) - $1,292,695; State Department of Social Services (JRTA program) - $184,432; State Department of Child Support Services - $109,458; and, Mental Health Fund - $49,037.

---

<sup>1</sup> CFCC had been reduced by 32 positions but two critical positions were filled by internal recruitments and one critical position remains unfilled.

3. Service supported by the new organizational plan for the Center for Families, Children & the Courts

The new organizational plan for the Center for Families, Children & the Courts refocuses on mandates and core services in 6 areas: Family, Juvenile, Collaborative Justice and Mental Health, Self-Help and Access to Justice, Family Violence, and Tribal/State Programs.

Each area provides centralized services available to all courts (such as the Judicial Branch Online Self-Help Center, the California Dependency Online Guide, and multidisciplinary educational resources for judicial officers and that meet mandatory training requirements for court staff) as well as direct services offered locally upon request of judicial officers and court administrators (such as legal services, resources to support compliance with rules and code as well as mutual recognition of orders issued by tribal and state courts, financial administration, technical assistance with court operations, cost-benefit analysis, and management reporting, and assistance responding to cases involving domestic violence).

The center continues to administer funding and assistance to statewide programs that support child support commissioners and facilitators, services for self represented litigants, collaborative justice courts, and court appointed special advocates and court appointed counsel in dependency cases.

Council Directive 60

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to consider maximizing and combining self-help resources with resources from similar subject programs, including resources provided through the Justice Corps and the Sergeant Shriver Civil Counsel program, and return to the council with an assessment and proposal.

SEC Recommendation 7-9

Self-represented litigants in small claims, collection matters, foreclosures, and landlord-tenant matters are frequent users of court self-help centers. A majority of self-help clients seek assistance in family law matters. Consideration should be given to maximizing and combining self-help resources with resources from similar subject programs, including resources provided through the Justice Corps and the Sergeant Shriver Civil Counsel program.

X	COMPLETED: Self help and similar programs were all placed in the Judicial and Court Operations Services Division in August 2012. To achieve greater efficiencies and greater oversight, AOC organizational restructuring approved by the Judicial Council in August 2012 placed self help and similar programs in the Judicial and Court Operations Services Division. The programs are Justice Corps, Family Law Facilitators, Self-Help Centers, Model Self Help Programs, Family Law Information Centers, Self Help Assistance and Technology, Equal Access legal services and partnership grants, Shriver Civil Representation Pilots, California Courts Online Self-Help Center content.

The Legal Services Office provides subject matter consultation in small claims, landlord-tenant matters, and other case types involving high proportions of self represented parties. A formal protocol for coordination of self help resources within the Judicial and Court Operations Services Division has been developed in order to optimize the effectiveness of the new organizational structure and to maximize efficiencies following the workforce reduction of 4 positions formerly dedicated to self help services in CFCC. With the reductions in workforce, in addition to working on self-help programs, remaining staff must also cover assignments in family, family violence, juvenile, and court operations special services.

Judicial Council Directive #60

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to consider maximizing and combining self-help resources with resources from similar subject programs, including resources provided through the Justice Corps and the Sargent Shriver Civil Counsel program, and return to the council with an assessment and proposal.

Corresponding SEC Recommendation

Self-represented litigants in small claims, collection matters, foreclosures, and landlord-tenant matters are frequent users of court self-help centers. A majority of self-help clients seek assistance in family law matters. Consideration should be given to maximizing and combining self-help resources with resources from similar subject programs, including resources provided through the Justice Corps and the Sargent Shriver Civil Counsel program.

Directive #60 Assessment and Proposal

Judicial Council Directive 60 requires the Administrative Director of the Courts is to return to the council with an assessment and proposal for maximizing and combining AOC's self-help resources with resources from similar subject programs. The AOC organizational structure adopted by council in August 2012 places all staff working on self-help and related programs in the same division. Additional consultation is provided by LSO staff. A formal protocol for resource coordination is proposed.

1. Organizational Restructuring

On August 31, 2012, the Judicial Council approved a new organizational structure for the Administrative Office of the Courts, proposed by the interim Administrative Director of the Courts and incoming Administrative Director of the Courts. The new organizational structure reduced the AOC Executive Team to four positions (Administrative Director, Chief of Staff, Chief Operating Officer, and Chief Administrative Officer) and realigned and renamed existing divisions into offices housed under one of three newly created divisions (Judicial Council and Court Leadership Services Division, Judicial and Court Operations Services Division, and Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division). The approved organizational structure became effective on October 1, 2012.

This new organizational structure places resources for self-help and similar subject programs within The Judicial and Court Operations Division, in order to realize greater efficiencies and effective oversight. The Division includes staff who work with self-help centers, family law facilitators, the Sargent Shriver Civil Representation Pilot Project and the Justicecorps programs. Division staff consult with the Legal Services Office regarding small claims advisors and mediation programs that serve self-represented litigants. The Legal Services office provides subject matter expertise to the Sargent Shriver Civil Representation Pilot Project.

Workforce reductions in The Judicial and Court Operations Division have eliminated four positions that worked on these programs. In addition, approximately 1 FTE in staff time that had been redirected from other units is no longer available due to workforce reductions in those units.

2. Coordination Protocol for Self-Help Resources

Staff work well and closely together and have formalized the structure for communications and coordination of resources in an effort to maximize efficiency and enhance services for the courts. This protocol formalizes existing methods of communication and coordination among AOC staff who work on a variety of programs that provide self-help assistance to the courts.

- 1) An email group has been established for this group to ensure that information of interest to all is shared easily, and that the various court groups that staff works with receive information that may be of interest to them across the spectrum of these services.
- 2) Staff will meet every two months to update each other on projects and to consider ways to provide additional assistance to the courts. Regular topics on the agenda will include:
  - a) General update on programs
  - b) Ideas for expansion of Justicecorps and other student service to self-help centers
  - c) Enhancing resources for courts who wish to use volunteers to supplement staff in self-help programs
  - d) Developing educational resources, conferences and training sessions for court staff to assist them in providing services
  - e) Technology projects that will assist self-help centers and self-represented litigants directly
  - f) Coordination of efforts to provide services to persons with limited English proficiency
  - g) Updates on program evaluation strategies including the evaluation mandated by the legislature for the Sargent Shriver Civil Counsel Act
  - h) Coordination with Judicial Council Advisory Committees and Task Forces on issues regarding self-represented litigants
- 3) Staff will coordinate on grant proposals, budget change proposals, and other efforts to increase resources for the branch to provide assistance to self-represented persons

Governmental Affairs currently works with the process developed by the Policy Coordination and Liaison Committee (PCLC) to ensure that any legislative proposals generated by the council staff on behalf of the Judicial Council follow the process established by PCLC. That process is set forward in the PCLC Resource materials provided to PCLC as part of their orientation and to the new Judicial Council members as part of theirs. Orientation materials and Legislative Policy Guidelines are also distributed to all Governmental Affairs staff.

Each calendar year the PCLC chair provides a memorandum to the Advisory Committee chairs and staff advising them of the timelines and process for developing Judicial Council-sponsored legislation. Advisory body and Governmental Affairs staff are directed, as they work with Advisory Committees on legislative proposals, whether they be timely developed proposals or on proposals with more urgent need, to continue to remind the Advisory Committees of the PCLC process and the need to track the process to the greatest extent possible to ensure that legislative proposals are fully developed. This ensures that PCLC can make comprehensive and informed recommendations for Judicial Council-sponsored legislation and that the legislative proposals are fully vetted.

Policy Coordination and Liaison Committee

The role of the Policy Coordination and Liaison Committee (PCLC) is to represent the council before the legislative and executive branches of government, build consensus with stakeholders and individuals outside the branch and coordinate an annual plan for communication and interaction with other agencies and entities.

The charge and duties of the committee, set forth in California Rules of Court, rule 10.12, including the following:

- 1) Take positions on behalf of the council on pending legislative bills, after evaluating input from the council advisory bodies and the courts, provided that the position is consistent with the council's established policies and precedents;
- 2) Make recommendations to the council on all proposals for council-sponsored legislation and on an annual legislative agenda after evaluating input from council advisory bodies and the courts;
- 3) Represent the council's position before the Legislature and other bodies or agencies and acting as liaison with other governmental entities, the bar, the judiciary, and the public regarding council-sponsored legislation, pending legislative bills, and the council's legislative positions and agendas;
- 4) Build consensus on issues of importance to the judicial branch consistent with the council's strategic plan with entities and individuals outside the branch;
- 5) Develop an annual plan for communication and interaction with other branches and levels of government, components of the judicial system, the bar, the media, and the public; and
- 6) Direct any advisory committee to provide it with analysis or recommendations on pending or proposed legislation.

Guidelines for Development of Judicial Council–sponsored Legislation

This summary describes the typical process the Judicial Council follows when developing and approving proposals for sponsored legislation. It also describes how Governmental Affairs advocates for enactment of these proposals in the Legislature.

I. Judicial Council Process

A. Sources of Legislative Proposals

Because it often takes several months to fully develop a legislative proposal, the process should begin early in the year. (See the Judicial Council–sponsored Legislation Calendar.) Judicial Council advisory committees are well situated to identify and develop proposals for statutory change. Committee members have extensive expertise in the committee’s subject area and often have ideas for improving statutory law. In addition, advisory committees may receive requests for council sponsorship of legislative proposals from outside sources.

Suggestions for how an advisory committee may wish to identify proposals for council–sponsored legislation include:

- The advisory committee chair may devote a portion of one or more meetings each year to identifying legislative proposals for the following year’s legislative session.
- The advisory committee may establish a working group or task force composed of committee members responsible for reviewing the relevant codes, or specific subjects or issues within those codes, to identify potential legislation.
- Advisory committees may receive legislative proposals from outside sources. When a person or organization submits a legislative proposal to the Judicial Council, staff forwards the proposal to the appropriate advisory committee and Governmental Affairs staff for consideration.

B. Advisory Committee Process for Developing Proposals

This section describes the steps an advisory committee takes to develop and review legislative proposals for substantive merit.

1. Assess Viability of Proposal – For each legislative proposal, the advisory committee takes the following actions:

- The advisory committee, in consultation with Governmental Affairs staff, determines a time frame for consideration of the proposal, keeping in mind the September/October deadline for submission of legislative proposals to PCLC.

- If the advisory committee rejects a proposal submitted by an outside source, committee staff will notify the proponent of that action.
- If the advisory committee accepts or modifies a proposal from an outside source, or decides to recommend sponsorship of an internally generated proposal, the committee proceeds to the next steps.

2. Coordination with Governmental Affairs – Advisory committee staff will work with Governmental Affairs staff to coordinate work on all aspects of the proposals.

3. Review and Analyze – Advisory committees review proposals for substantive merit before transmitting them to PCLC. A typical analysis of a proposal should include:

- A description of the problem to be addressed, including its scope.
- A description of how the problem affects the judicial branch.
- A description of the proposed solution.
- A discussion of any alternative solutions, including an analysis of why the recommended solution is preferable.
- A discussion of any minority viewpoints.
- A description of any foreseeable problems with the proposed solution.
- Draft language for the proposed legislation.
- A determination whether the Judicial Council and/or the Legislature should give the proposal urgent consideration and the reasons for this.

A worksheet that advisory committees may use for laying out this analysis and other important considerations can be found on page 16.

4. Evaluate Sponsorship Criteria – Once an advisory committee determines that a particular proposal has merit, the committee should consider certain criteria in assessing whether Judicial Council sponsorship is appropriate and desirable. Limited resources, competing priorities, and political realities impose practical limitations on the council's ability to sponsor every worthwhile legislative proposal presented. The advisory committee and Governmental Affairs should jointly consider each of the following questions:

- Is the proposal within the Judicial Council's purview?

Council-sponsored measures should involve only those issues that are central to the council's mission and goals as stated in the Judicial Council's Strategic Plan.

- Should the proposal be addressed through the Judicial Council's rulemaking authority rather than by a change in statute?

The council prefers to implement changes through rules of court wherever appropriate.

- Is the Judicial Council the best sponsor?

The advisory committee and Governmental Affairs may determine that a proposal more closely serves the mission or objectives of another organization such as the State Bar. A Judicial Council-sponsored proposal should address issues fundamental to the administration of justice and broadly serve the needs of the courts statewide.

- What political factors are associated with the proposal?

Governmental Affairs is responsible for providing advice about the political factors associated with a proposal.

5. Circulate for Comment– If an advisory committee wishes to circulate a proposal for comment, the committee staff consults with Governmental Affairs. If it is determined that the proposal is appropriate for circulation, the committee submits the proposal to PCLC for consideration. If PCLC agrees with the advisory committee's recommendation, the proposal may be circulated for public comment. After the comment deadline, committee staff and Governmental Affairs jointly review the comments. Advisory committee staff then summarizes and presents the comments to the committee. Following consideration of the comments, the advisory committee may modify the proposal based on the comments, recommend adoption of the proposal as originally presented, or recommend non-adoption based on the comments received.

6. Advisory Committee Action – Upon completion of the review procedures and consideration of the evaluation criteria above, the advisory committee may adopt one of the following actions:

- Approve the proposal as submitted.
- Approve the proposal with modifications.
- Reject the proposal. The advisory committee should inform the source of the proposal of this decision.

If the advisory committee approves the proposal, the committee forwards the proposal to PCLC for consideration. Final proposals must be submitted to PCLC using the template for memos to Judicial Council internal committees by the September/October deadline in order to be considered for Judicial Council sponsorship during the following legislative year. All advisory committee proposals submitted to PCLC are referred to Governmental Affairs, which may prepare a separate analysis and recommendation for PCLC.

C. Policy Coordination and Liaison Committee Action

In October, PCLC will review the proposal(s), the advisory committee recommendation(s), and any analyses and recommendations prepared by Governmental Affairs. PCLC may recommend the proposal for Judicial Council sponsorship and forward it to the Judicial Council, send it back to the advisory committee for further consideration, or take other action as necessary. If PCLC modifies or rejects the proposal, Governmental Affairs will return the proposal to the submitting advisory committee. The advisory committee may either accept PCLC's action or request that the full council review PCLC's recommendation.

D. Judicial Council Action

The sponsored-legislation proposal is presented by PCLC to the Judicial Council in December for consideration. The Judicial Council reviews the proposal, along with PCLC's recommendation contained in a report prepared by Governmental Affairs. Once the council approves a proposal, it becomes "sponsored" legislation. If the Judicial Council does not approve the proposal for sponsorship, or takes some other action on the proposal, Governmental Affairs will communicate the action to the submitting advisory committee.

E. Delegation of authority to PCLC to sponsor legislative proposals on behalf of the council

The Judicial Council has delegated to PCLC the authority to take positions to sponsor legislative proposals on behalf of the council when time is of the essence. This situation most often will arise in the context of the budget and related “trailer bill language.” Acting under this delegation, PCLC notifies the chairs of the Executive and Planning Committee and the Rules and Projects Committee of any PCLC meetings at which such actions will be considered so that they may participate if available. PCLC is also required to notify all other Judicial Council members, if feasible, of the intended action. After acting under this delegation, PCLC is required to notify the Judicial Council of all actions taken.

II. Advocacy Process

A. Legislative Author

Governmental Affairs staff will seek a legislator to introduce the council–sponsored proposal. An appropriate author for the bill is one who:

- Has substantial experience with the subject of the bill; often the author is the chair or a member of the policy committee with subject-matter jurisdiction over the bill.
- Understands Judicial Council needs and objectives.
- Has experience with the legislative process.
- Is an effective negotiator with members of both parties.

B. Governmental Affairs Responsibilities

Governmental Affairs acts as the primary advocate for Judicial Council–sponsored legislation. Responsibilities include, among other things:

- Preparing background material for the bill, including analyses for the author. The analyses include a description of the problem the bill seeks to address, an explanation of how the bill corrects that problem, the likely supporters and opponents of the bill, questions the bill raises that may need further research, and any other information that explains the issue.
- Communicating information about the bill to the appropriate legislative committee with subject-matter jurisdiction. This means working extensively with committee staff as well as the legislators who are members of those committees. In moving through the legislative process, a bill will be heard by at least one policy committee (such as the Judiciary Committee), and, if appropriate, a fiscal committee, before being debated and voted upon by the full membership on the floor of each house.

- Coordinating with supporters to build a broad coalition in support of the bill.
- Coordinating the content and timing of correspondence between all supporters and the Legislature.
- Negotiating with the proposal's opponents to determine whether amendments can eliminate opposition and still achieve the council's objectives.
- Meeting with the Governor and/or his or her staff to advocate that the bill be signed into law.

Formulating a Position on Pending Legislation (not sponsored by Judicial Council)

The Judicial Council, acting through the Policy Coordination and Liaison Committee (PCLC), strives to improve the administration of justice by representing the interests of the judicial branch to the Legislature, the executive branch, other entities involved in the legislative process or interested in the judiciary, and the general public.

The Judicial Council supports the integrity and independence of the judicial branch and seeks to ensure that judicial procedures enhance efficiency and access to the courts. The council generally does not take a position on substantive law/policy. However, the council may take a position on legislation that involve issues central to the council's mission and goals as stated in the Judicial Council's Strategic Plan. The council may also take a position on an apparent issue of substantive law if issues presented directly affect court administration or negatively affect existing judicial services by imposing unrealistic burdens on the judicial branch.

The following are procedures Governmental Affairs uses in developing recommendations for and carrying out PCLC and council directives regarding legislation.

Positions on Legislation

Governmental Affairs reviews all introduced and amended legislation to determine whether a bill is of interest to the judicial branch. For each bill of interest, staff determines whether the council is likely to take, or may want to take a position on the bill. One or more council advisory committees (or subcommittees) within the appropriate subject area review each bill on which the council may want to take a position. The advisory committees either recommend a position or recommend that the council take no position.

Governmental Affairs presents bills on which an advisory committee recommends a position to PCLC for determination of a council position. Additionally, staff may also choose to bring a bill before PCLC on which an advisory committee has recommended no position. Staff presents each bill to PCLC with an analysis that includes a summary of the bill, a recommended position from one or more advisory committees and, if different, the Governmental Affairs recommendation, the rationale for the recommendation(s), positions the council has taken on related bills, fiscal and workload impacts, and other relevant information.

The council has established several positions PCLC may take on a bill. These positions do not indicate the relative strength of the council's support or opposition, but the aims of Governmental Affairs advocacy efforts. The positions are:

- 1) Oppose: An oppose position may be taken on a bill that conflicts with established council policies, and for which obvious changes would not resolve the conflict.

- 2) Oppose unless amended (or unless funded): This position may be taken on a bill that the council will oppose unless identified amendments are taken to address those provisions that conflict with council policy, or unless funding issues are resolved.
- 3) Neutral: A neutral position taken on a bill the substance of which does not implicate council policy, but on which technical corrections would improve the measure.
- 4) Support in concept: This position may be taken on a bill that, in concept, furthers council policy, but that is not yet drafted in sufficient detail for the council to support.
- 5) Support if amended (or if funded): This position may be taken on a bill that, with specified amendments or funding, would further the council's policies. Absent the amendments or necessary funding the council position is neutral.
- 6) Support: Position taken on a bill that furthers council policy.
- 7) No position: PCLC may choose to take no position on a bill that addresses substantive issues on which the council takes no position, though the measure may affect the courts.

PCLC may also combine several of the above positions. PCLC may also provide instruction to Governmental Affairs to do further research or work with the author prior to taking a position on a bill.

PCLC Meeting Schedule and Agenda

PCLC meets regularly during the legislative session, usually by conference call. Beginning in late February or early March, the committee sets a schedule of meetings at least every three weeks. If a meeting is not needed, Governmental Affairs will notify PCLC members by e-mail of the cancellation. Late in the legislative session, and during budget negotiations, it is sometimes necessary to schedule several meetings on short notice to discuss or resolve late-breaking issues. All PCLC meetings must be in compliance with California Rule of Court, Rule 10.75 governing meetings of advisory bodies.

Governmental Affairs prepares a written analysis of each bill for PCLC. Governmental Affairs may place bills that do not appear to require discussion or deliberation on PCLC's consent calendar. The consent calendar saves the committee time by eliminating the need to review bills that are consistent with clearly established council policies and positions. However, any committee member may remove an item from the consent calendar to discuss the bill's merits or the recommended action.

Bills that are on the discussion agenda include those that require discussion, and those bills on which the staff recommendation differs from the recommendation of an advisory committee or when the recommendations from two or more advisory committees differ. In the latter instances, staff will request that a representative of the advisory committee(s) participate in the PCLC meeting. The representatives will present the advisory committee's views, and take questions from PCLC members. PCLC may then excuse the guest and deliberate further and prior to taking action.

Legislative Advocacy

Once PCLC adopts a position on a bill, it is the position of the Judicial Council. That position and associated policies become the cornerstone of Governmental Affairs advocacy efforts. The adopted position is presented in subsequent negotiating sessions, discussions with interested parties, and meetings with legislators. A letter setting forth the position and policies is sent to the bill's author, legislative committee members, and other interested parties.

Generally, PCLC's initial guidance and position is sufficient to direct Governmental Affairs advocacy throughout the legislative process. Occasionally, as a bill progresses or is amended, staff will request further direction from PCLC because of a particular bill's significance, complexity, the sensitivity of an issue, or the direction taken by the amendments. PCLC may be asked to reconsider the matter at a subsequent meeting.

Coordination with other groups

The Judicial Council advances its position on legislation most successfully when it allies itself with other entities such as county government representatives, law enforcement, attorneys, and consumer advocates. Governmental Affairs will work to develop coalitions on issues of common interest. These coalitions often last for years, effectively supporting and opposing a variety of bills. For example, the council's efforts regarding trial court facilities legislation involved close coordination with the California State Association of Counties. Other groups with which the council has long-standing working coalitions include the Consumer Attorneys of California, the Bench-Bar Coalition, California Defense Counsel, the California Judges Association (CJA), the State Bar of California, and others. These and other working relationships have evolved during many years of cooperative effort.

On most court-related issues, Governmental Affairs maintains close contact with representatives of CJA and the State Bar. Additionally, Governmental Affairs confers regularly with the California Court Association Legislation Committee (CCALC) to discuss or request analytical information about pending legislation with members of the court community. The CCALC members are court employees who provide vital input related to the operational impact of proposed legislation.

Legislative fiscal analysis

In addition to its legislative screening process, Governmental Affairs identifies bills that require a fiscal analysis. In the years since the State assumed responsibility for trial court funding, Governmental Affairs has, through joint efforts with the Finance Division, developed a process to ensure that both timely and accurate fiscal analyses are submitted to the Legislature. The legislative advocate works with the fiscal analyst to develop an accurate fiscal analysis. The fiscal analyst confirms the cost issues and, if necessary, works with the advocate to determine an appropriate approach and methodology, identify available resources, and clarify any technical issues affecting the analysis.

There are a variety of resources available to assist in the development of fiscal and workload analyses. The Office of Court Research assists in data collection and analysis. Governmental Affairs also works closely with other council program areas (e.g., civil, criminal, family, and juvenile law, jury service, traffic programs, and the court interpreter program). Staff also works with local courts to assist in the development of fiscal analyses. The Operational and Budget Impact Working Group of the Court Executives Advisory Committee has identified court staff with whom Governmental Affairs may consult to get input in large, medium, small, urban, and rural courts on the fiscal impact of pending legislation.

Judicial Council Legislative Policy Summary

The Judicial Council Legislative Policy Summary sets forth the council's historical policies on key legislative issues. The summary helps to ensure that council members, advisory committee members, and council staff have a common understanding of council policy on issues presented in proposed legislation. The summary reflects the council's most recent positions on legislative issues and identifies how those positions are derived from the Judicial Council's strategic plan. The Legislative Policy Summary also defines the Judicial Council's limited purview when considering pending legislation.

Formulating a Judicial Council Position on Legislation (not sponsored by Judicial Council)

Governmental Affairs

When bills are introduced in the Legislature, Governmental Affairs identifies those that may affect the judicial branch. Governmental Affairs summarizes the bill, describes key aspects of the legislation and, if within Judicial Council purview, forwards the bill to a Judicial Council advisory committee for review and recommendation.

Advisory Committee

The advisory committee (or its subcommittee) reviews the legislation and recommends a position. The advisory committee recommendation along with Governmental Affairs analysis and recommendation are presented to the PCLC for review.

Policy Coordination and Liaison Committee

PCLC reviews the bill, Governmental Affairs analysis, and recommendation(s). The committee, on behalf of the Judicial Council, may adopt one of the following positions on the bill:

- oppose
- oppose unless amended (or funded)
- neutral
- support if amended (or funded)
- support
- some combination of these
- no position

In an unusual circumstance, PCLC may refer the bill to the full Judicial Council for review and position. Once PCLC or the Judicial Council has taken a position, Governmental Affairs advocates that position throughout the legislative process.

Outreach Activities

Governmental Affairs seeks to promote effective communications within California's judicial branch, and with the legislative and executive branches of government. To enhance these efforts, Governmental Affairs has established outreach programs that inform the Governor, members of the Legislature, and the legal community about the judicial branch and issues of mutual concern.

State of the Judiciary Address and the Judicial-Legislative-Executive Forum

The Chief Justice of California typically delivers an annual State of the Judiciary address early in the calendar year to a joint session of the Legislature. The address focuses on significant issues and challenges facing the judiciary in the upcoming year. (Following the address, a meet-and-greet is conducted, providing an opportunity for members of the Legislature, the executive branch, appellate and trial courts, and the Bench-Bar Coalition to discuss issues and meet informally with the Chief Justice and other judicial branch leaders.)

Legislative Visits

Governmental Affairs coordinates legislative visits for council members in January and February and a reception for legislators in January, as well as any legislative visits for the Trial Court Presiding Judges Advisory Committee or the Court Executive Officers Advisory Committee.

Liaison Program

Working with interested groups toward achieving common goals has been a long-standing component of Governmental Affairs' advocacy work. The liaison program is the office's ongoing effort to work cooperatively with stakeholders involved with and important to the judicial branch, including the Attorney General, the California Judges Association, the California State Association of Counties, the California District Attorneys Association, the California Public Defenders Association, the State Bar of California, civil plaintiffs and defense bars, legal services organizations, and others. Where our positions on issues concur, we form alliances to enhance our advocacy efforts. When our positions on issues differ, we negotiate to reach agreements whenever possible. In support of this ongoing liaison effort, the Chief Justice hosts annual meetings with the leadership of several external organizations to discuss issues of mutual concern.

Statewide Bench-Bar Coalition

The Judicial Council and the State Bar of California coordinate the statewide Bench-Bar Coalition (BBC). The BBC enhances communication and coordinates the activities of the judicial community with the State Bar, including: local, minority and specialty bars associations and legal services organizations regarding issues of common interest, particularly in the legislative arena.

Day on the Bench Program

The Day on the Bench program is an event in which a legislator spends a day (or portion of a day) in court with a judge in the legislator's district. This program, cosponsored with the California Judges Association, is designed to give legislators an understanding of the volume, complexity, variety, and difficulty of a trial court judge's daily duties and responsibilities.

California Court Association Legislation Committee (CCALC)

The California Court Association Legislation Committee is composed of professional court staff from various courts throughout the state, including court managers, supervisors, and technical staff. Throughout the legislative session, OGA staff confers with CCALC to exchange information on pending legislation and help inform Judicial Council positions.

Publications and Information Services

To facilitate communication, staff distributes the following information on current legislative developments.

Legislative Status Chart –Governmental Affairs prepares a chart that provides an easy reference to all council actions on pending legislation, including Judicial Council-Sponsored legislation.

Table of Bills Affecting Appellate Courts –Governmental Affairs prepares a chart of legislative bills that affect the appellate courts or that respond to California appellate court decisions.

Each year, Governmental Affairs publishes a comprehensive summary of enacted legislation that affects the courts or is of general interest to the legal community. # Information on Judicial Council Directives

Council Directive 62

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts that a systems review of the manner in which AOC staff review trial court records should be conducted to streamline Judicial Review and Technical Assistance audits, if possible, and to lessen the impact on court resources.

SEC Recommendation 7-7

A systems review of the manner in which trial court records are reviewed should be conducted to streamline audits, if possible, and to lessen the impact on court resources.

| <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> | COMPLETED: The Center for Families, Children &amp; the Courts have taken efforts to reduce the burden/workload on the courts as it relates to juvenile dependency case file reviews for Title IV-E findings. |

CFCC worked very hard with the Judicial Resources and Technical Assistance staff to reduce workload for the courts as it relates to review of juvenile dependency case files for Title IV-E findings.

These efforts have included:

- Using non-attorney staff for activities that do not require legal expertise.
- Spreading the JRTA review amongst a greater number of CFCC staff.
- Reaching out to the courts well in advance to discuss how records can be accessed for the review.

The JRTA System Review recommendations implemented to reduce program burdens on the court:

1. Ensure that judicial officers, court staff, and stakeholders understand that JRTA liaisons conduct a courtesy file review and do not audit court files.
2. Give courts up to 9 months to schedule site visits.
3. Reduce the frequency of reviews for courts when prior reviews find no need for technical assistance.
4. Conduct interviews at the convenience of the judicial officer.
5. Offer the services of the liaison to pull and reshelv files.
6. Reduce the volume of material that judicial officers are asked to review; develop fact sheets, bench cards and other tools whenever possible.
7. Focus the file review on mandated state and federal eligibility determinations and any issues raised by the presiding juvenile court judge.
8. Provide county agencies with recommendations and training to improve the information provided to the court, thereby reducing hearing delays and unnecessary workload for courts.
9. Respond to court requests for caseload management consultation.

In addition to restructuring and operational changes described above, the following recommendations from the System Review have been implemented to streamline the program:

1. Replace in-person and telephone communications with less time consuming communications, such as email, whenever possible.
2. Administrative staff is responsible for visit logistics and report and material production; and an education specialist develops tools and educational materials.
3. Pilot remote review of digitized case files.
4. Measure impact of JRTA services on court workload.

To gain additional input from the trial courts as it relates to JRTA visits, the CFCC Director will send an email to the Juvenile Presiding Judge following each visit, inquiring how the visit went and asking for any suggestions about improving JRTA services. This practice will be implemented with the next JRTA visit, scheduled in the second quarter of calendar year 2015.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

OTHER INFORMATION

- Judicial Resources and Technical Assistance (JRTA) Project Systems Review Report

Judicial Resources and Technical Assistance (JRTA) Project Systems Review Report

Judicial Council Directive #62 calls for a systems review of the manner in which AOC staff review trial court records to streamline the Judicial Resources and Technical Assistance (JRTA) audits, if possible, and to lessen the impact on court resources. The review included interviews with judicial officers, probation officers, social workers and attorneys; program data; and an assessment of the written reports provided to the courts. Attachment 1 is a thumbnail summary of all findings of the review.

1. Project Description

The JRTA project responds directly to questions from judicial officers and juvenile court professionals related to dependency and delinquency law and case management. JRTA attorneys visit local courts to conduct courtesy reviews of court files, providing judges with an overview of the findings and orders necessary to maintain compliance with federal and state statute. Most problems found are related to the presentation of information to the court by dependency and delinquency professionals such as social workers, county counsel, probation, and attorneys for parents and children. After consultation with the bench, the JRTA attorney provides the appropriate county agencies with recommendations and training to improve the information provided to the court. In the course of the year, JRTA attorneys respond to court requests for additional targeted visits and special training sessions for juvenile court professionals in the county<sup>i</sup>.

2. JRTA Objectives

- a. Identify and educate juvenile court partners about problems related to notice and completeness, timeliness, and quality of reports to the court that lead to delayed hearings;
- b. Reduce length of time cases spend in system;
- c. Reduce judicial officer and clerk time spent managing incomplete and inadequate filings, case backlogs and courtroom delays;
- d. Reduce judicial officer and clerk time spent adapting courtroom procedure to new legislation and case law;
- e. Avoid federal penalties and denial of funds for children in foster care; and
- f. Improve outcomes for children in dependency including the length of time spent in foster care before reunification with families or adoption.

3. Juvenile Dependency Caseflow Management Issues Addressed by JRTA

Dependency caseflow management is a focal area of JRTA service to the courts. Providing judicial officers with the resources to manage dependency cases effectively reduces court costs, the ineffective use of judicial officer and clerk time, and the time children spend in foster care.

Juvenile dependency cases are among the most complex addressed by the court. In the Judicial Council's 2011 Judicial Workload Assessment ("Assessment")<sup>ii</sup>, juvenile dependency ranked second, behind asbestos, in adjusted minutes required per case (269 minutes). The workload of judicial officers in dependency is very high. A legislative report based on the 2011 Assessment, Assessing the Need for New Judgeships in Family and Juvenile Law Assignments, notes that current judicial resources meet only 65 percent of the assessed need in dependency<sup>iii</sup>.

Courts face characteristic challenges in managing juvenile dependency caseloads: a complex statutory scheme which specifies numerous timelines, actions, findings and orders unique to each hearing; a variety of parties to the case with multiple cases within sibling groups; complex noticing requirements and frequently inexperienced attorneys representing the county child welfare agency, children, and parents.

Dependency cases require effective caseload management to avoid cases that are delayed and out of compliance with federal and state statutes, wasted judicial officer and clerk time dealing with notice problems, calendar backlogs, and requests for continuances; the court and county spending more dollars per case when cases stay in the system through unnecessary delays; children spending unneeded weeks and months in foster homes or group homes; and the loss of federal dollars to the child welfare system for foster children when cases are not in statutory compliance.

In 2008-2010 the AOC conducted a detailed study of dependency caseload in 2 pilot courts. The findings document the potential for delay and wasted court resources in the system: an extremely complex caseload, cases that averaged 1.2 years in length with 11 separate hearings per case, and one-half of cases out of compliance with statutory timelines<sup>iv</sup>. Statewide there are 70,400 juvenile dependency cases<sup>v</sup>, leading to considerable court costs statewide when hearings are routinely delayed or extended.

Judicial officers hearing dependency cases reported to the AOC that the most common reasons for case delays include late social worker reports (61 percent), lack of notice or late notice (44 percent), attorney not available (38 percent), and not enough time to hear the court case (19 percent)<sup>vi</sup>. These are all problems that the JRTA project's resources, consultation with judicial officers and education of dependency system partners are designed to alleviate.

During the Assessment, judicial officers in juvenile court indicated their need for more time to spend on cases:

- Reviewing files and preparing for hearings;
- Conducting both short and long cause hearings;
- Preparing findings and orders;
- Ensuring that parties feel their concerns have been addressed;
- Conducting settlement conferences; and
- Encouraging all interested parties to participate in the proceedings<sup>vii</sup>.

The goal of the JRTA project is to make some of this needed time available to judicial officers by improving the flow of information to the court.

4. Analysis of JRTA Impact on the Courts

Approximately 30 court visits are made each year by attorneys from the JRTA team. The ten largest courts in the state are visited every year, and smaller courts every other year. Each visit begins with a contact with the court executive or designee to discuss the timing of the visit. The court chooses which week the liaison will come to conduct the file review. This is followed by emails to the presiding court judge, juvenile presiding court judge and court executive describing the purpose of the visit. At this time judges may ask the liaison to expand the courtesy file review to include an optional topic, such as findings and orders regarding non-minor dependents.

In the initial contact the liaison will offer to pull and reshelve the files being reviewed. If this is not acceptable to the court the liaison will provide a list of 10 dependency and 10 delinquency files to review.

During the week of the court visit, the liaison requires a small work space. Liaisons bring their own computers and do not ask for photocopies of materials. If the judge permits, the liaison will observe court hearings to gain an understanding of the court's process. At the end of the week the liaison generally meets with the juvenile court presiding judge and other dependency judges. Judges generally want to review and discuss any cases where the findings and orders related to IVE eligibility do not comply with federal statutes.

After the review the liaison provides updates of any resource materials related to the review, and a written report on the findings of the review. Courts frequently request a follow up visit or technical assistance.

A JRTA site visit involves approximately 8 hours of work for a court or court site, including: participation of court executive (1 hour), participation of judges (2 hours), and assistance from clerks locating a work space for the liaison, pulling and reshelving 20 files (up to 4 hours).

An encouraging development is the possibility of JRTA staff conducting the file review remotely, for those courts with digitized juvenile dependency case files. This approach is being piloted.

5. Direct Costs of Project

JRTA is funded by an inter-agency agreement with the California Department of Social Services. The contracted work includes:

- Approximately 30 annual site visits to courts including courtesy file review, meetings with the court and stakeholders and education for stakeholders
- Written analysis of courtesy file reviews
- Approximately 20 annual follow up visits at the request of the court for consultation and education
- Telephone consultation with judicial officers and legal research
- Creating new bench cards and supporting materials
- Updating current bench cards and supporting materials

JRTA requires 4.0 full time equivalent attorneys. The interagency agreement provides $842,000 per year for personnel and travel. Any overage, including supervision, rent and grants management costs, is covered by funding from the federal Court Improvement Program – Training.

6. Benefits to the Courts

In estimating benefits to the courts, staff reviewed foster care data from U.C. Berkeley and the results of an AOC study of dependency case flow in two pilot courts. Through file review, consultation, and training on hearing preparation and hearing timeliness, JRTA has been one of the major drivers in a statewide effort to reduce the time children spend in foster care. Between 2005 and 2010 the median time spent in care dropped from 457 days to 426 days, a reduction of one month. Courts and counties that focused on programs to reduce the time in care, including the JRTA project, demonstrated that reductions of 3 months are achievable.

We estimate that a reduction statewide of three months median time spent in foster care leads to a reduction in hearings of 120,000 statewide.

7. JRTA Systems Review Improvements

In response to the Judicial Council Directive #62, the JRTA project is implementing the following steps to reduce the impact of the project on the courts and improve the overall benefits of the project to the courts:

A. Lessening the Impact on Court Resources

- Continue to give courts wide latitude in scheduling site visits. (Implemented.) In a year that JRTA hopes to visit a court, the court generally has a window of about nine months in which to schedule the visit. Courts can also defer the visit to the following year if necessary.

- Offer the services of the liaison to pull and reshelve files. (Implemented.) Attorney liaisons are experienced in court processes, and many courts allow the liaison to pull and reshelve files. When the court prefers to pull the files, the liaison offers alternatives including taking a “snapshot” by using the unfiled cases heard that day or week.
- Minimize communications with the judicial officers and court staff. (Implemented.) JRTA staff now schedule visits through brief emails. Interviews are conducted at the convenience of the judicial officer, frequently in chambers after a calendar is heard.
- Reduce the volume of material that judicial officers are asked to review. (Implemented.) At the request of courts, JRTA has developed numerous fact sheets and tools to assist with judicial determinations related to reasonable efforts and title IV E eligibility. It is now the practice of liaisons to review this packet after the court visit, in light of the results of the file review and the interview with the presiding juvenile court judge, and send electronically only those materials immediately relevant to the court.
- Focus the file review on mandated state and federal eligibility determinations and any issues raised by the presiding juvenile court judge. (Implemented.) Restricting the scope of the file review saves the time of the judicial officer by ensuring that discussion of the findings, in person and in the report, will be limited to eligibility findings and any topics the judicial officer wanted raised in the review.
- Reduce the frequency of reviews for courts when prior reviews find no need for technical assistance. (Implemented.)
- Provide follow up technical assistance requested by the court whenever possible through email, conference call or web ex, and reduce follow up visits. (Implemented.)

B. Additional Recommendations

- Ensure that judicial officers, court staff, and stakeholders understand that JRTA liaisons conduct a courtesy file review and do not audit court files. (Implemented.) This explanation has been incorporated into all JRTA project communications. In addition, the project name has been changed to Judicial Resources and Technical Assistance.
- Ensure that attorney roles and responsibilities on the JRTA project reflect their area of expertise. (Implemented.) Attorney liaisons conduct the courtesy file review, analyze the findings and write the report, communicate with judicial officers, and design and provide any requested technical assistance. Tasks such as the logistics of the visit, report and materials production are carried out by administrative support staff, and the role of translating findings into statewide educational materials is carried out by an educational specialist. Communication with the California Department of Social Services and contract management is carried out by a manager.

C. Increase project focus on caseflow improvement

Develop tools and training curricula for county counsel, social workers, probation officers, and parents and children's attorneys that will lead to a greater focus on the flow of information to the court, preparation for court and timely hearings.

D. Collect court workload data to measure impact of JRTA on workload.

Pilot data suggests that outcomes of the JRTA project play a large part in reducing hearing delays and the workload for the courts. JRTA has begun to collect data on timeliness and will analyze this in conjunction with court case management data, in selected courts, to quantify the impact of the program on court workload.

Personnel and travel costs are paid for by the state Department of Social Services.</li> <li>• Estimate that JRTA can help the courts shorten total length of cases by up to 3 months and improve preparedness of court partners, which translates into approximately 120,000 unnecessary hearings annually avoided for the courts.</li> <li>• More than $100 million in federal penalties avoided for the state since the beginning of JRTA</li> </ul>                  |
| Recommendations for improvement | Enhance value of project by modifying tools to make caseflow management resources more easily available; streamline the file review process to lessen impact on the courts (SEC recommendation); conduct quantitative cost benefit study of program costs compared to savings achieved for the courts.  |

<sup>i</sup> The JRTA project was created by the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) in 1995 in response to an eligibility audit of foster care cases by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Office of the Inspector General. Federal auditors determined that 39 percent of the cases reviewed were not eligible for title IV-E funding, and California's programs consequently faced a potential loss of $51.7 million. Chief Justice Malcolm M. Lucas launched the JRTA project in a letter to the judiciary in 1995, stressing the importance of the state not losing funds and of the courts working collaboratively with social service agencies and probation departments on this effort. More than 10 years later, in June 2003, California passed the title IV-E foster-care eligibility review. The report cited the work of the JRTA project as a strength contributing to the state's compliance. The most recent federal eligibility review, in 2012, made a point of recognizing the success of the partnership between the judiciary and the JRTA project, and noted that California passed the review with no judicial determination errors.

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to consider SEC Recommendation 7-10 and implement the necessary organizational and staffing changes, contingent upon the council's approval of an organizational structure for the AOC and taking into account the results of the classification and compensation studies to be completed.

SEC Recommendation 7-10

The Court Operations Special Services Office (COSSO), formerly CPAS, should be an office reporting to the Chief Operating Officer within the AOC's Judicial and Court Operations Services Division, rather than a stand-alone division. The COSSO manager position should be at the Senior Manager level.

This directive is now considered complete as follows:

Effective October 1, 2012, the directive that COSSO, currently named Court Operations Services, no longer be a stand-alone division, was changed as part of a new organizational structure approved by the Judicial Council. This new structure reduced the JCC Executive Team to four positions (Administrative Director, Chief of Staff, Chief Operating Officer, and Chief Administrative Officer) and realigned and renamed existing divisions into offices housed under one of three newly created divisions (Judicial Council and Court Leadership Services Division, Judicial and Court Operations Services Division, and Judicial and Court Administrative Services Division). As part of the new structure, Court Operations Services was moved under the Operations & Programs Division, under the leadership of the Chief Operating Officer (currently vacant) consistent with the directive.

Additionally, on August 21, 2015 the JCC completed its Classification and Compensation Study that resulted in the implementation of a new salary structure for the organization. The compensation phase of the project followed the classification portion of the study that began in December 2013 and ended in March of 2015, when JCC staff received their new classification specifications. All positions in the JCC were evaluated, and JCC employees were subsequently assigned a classification and provided with information as to whether their salary fell within, above, or below the new salary ranges employee classifications.

The results of the classification study validated that the duties of the Director of Court Operations Services were appropriate for the "Director" classification specification.

The unit which is now called Special Services Program Support currently has a manager and 6 staff members (one of whom is less than 1 FTE, for a total of 5.80 staff FTEs), representing a reduction since the SEC began its process. Specifically, one staff member left in connection with the AOC's Voluntary Separation Incentive Program (VSIP), and her position and its funding were eliminated; a part-time associate analyst assigned to JusticeCorps left and her position was eliminated as well. Further, two additional PEP staffers have been permanently reassigned to other units and their former functions eliminated. Specifically, the staff member who was formerly responsible for procedural fairness has been reassigned to the Court Language Access Support Program and the staff member who was formerly the lead staff to the Kleps Award Committee has been reassigned to Trial Court Leadership Services (which is now under the Chief of Staff).

Remaining Special Services Program Support staff provide service in four areas of focus:

In Fiscal Year 2013-2014, the IMF funding (which helps trial courts meet their matching funds requirement to draw down the federal grant) was increased by approximately $70k.

The role of council staff in support to JusticeCorps Program entails applying for the funding from the funder AmeriCorps, distributing the funding, and working with participating courts on the budgeting aspects for the program to ease the burden of grant fulfilling requirements.

ASSESSMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION

The Trial Court Budget Advisory Committee, in an attempt to fix a structural deficit in the Improvement and Modernization Fund was forced to cut approximately $12 million in critical program funding. The advisory committee will recommend to the Judicial Council to eliminate the $347,000 JusticeCorps funding in IMF, and direct that courts that wish to continue or start a JusticeCorps program find the matching funds internally or otherwise. Since that action JusticeCorps staff worked with the Alameda court (which serves as the lead court for the Bay Area courts with JusticeCorps programs) to develop a grant application to help the Bay Area courts meet their matching. The application was submitted March 20, 2015.

- Memo: Judicial Council Directive 68 regarding follow up to the 2013 Civic Summit, from Chief Justice Tani Cantil-Sakauye to Hon. Steven Jahr, March 21, 2013

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA

MEMORANDUM

Date: March 21, 2013

To: Hon. Steven Jahr
Administrative Director of the Courts

From: Hon. Tani Cantil-Sakauye
Chief Justice and Chair of the Judicial Council

Subject: Judicial Council Directive 68
Re: Follow up to the 2013 Civic Summit

---

This memo addresses Judicial Council Directive 68, under which the Administrative Director of the Courts was directed to report to the council at its April meeting regarding the following: “[T]he Judicial Council [will] consider whether to continue support for the Civics Education Program after the conclusion of the 2013 [Civic Learning California S]ummit.” The resounding success of that summit, which was held on February 28th, 2013, has solidified my commitment to build on the robust momentum created by this historic event. As such, I am requesting through this memorandum that you direct that the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) will continue to provide the necessary staffing to support the plan outlined below, and that you report as such to the Judicial Council in April 2013.

Chief Justice's Civics Education Plan for 2013 and Beyond

Your Constitution: Power of Democracy Steering Committee: Consolidate the Leadership Group on Civic Education and Public Outreach and the Civic Summit Steering Committee into one entity that will continue to oversee, develop and implement the initiatives below, as well as other strategies for harnessing the momentum created by the Civic Learning California Summit. Attached please find a charge and roster for the group.

- a. Civic Learning Award Program: Continue co-sponsoring the Civic Learning Award Program with State Superintendent of Public Instruction Tom Torlakson, which recognizes California public high schools for outstanding work in civic education. This initiative supports Commission for Impartial Courts (CIC) Final Report Recommendation 43, (g): Recognition programs that bring attention to teachers, judges, and court administrators who advance civics education should be promoted.
- b. K-12 Civic Learning Task Force: Collaborate with State Superintendent of Public Instruction Tom Torlakson to establish a K-12 Civic Learning Task Force which will make recommendations regarding civic learning in California public schools. The Task Force will be privately funded. This initiative supports CIC Final Report Recommendation 43, (a): Strategies for meaningful changes to civics education in California should be supported, and a strategic plan for judicial branch support for civics education should be developed and (b) Teacher training programs, curriculum development, and education programs on civics should all be expanded to include the courts

Background

In my role as head of the judicial branch of California, I am dedicated to educating the public, and students in particular, about the power of our democracy, so that the branch may continue to thrive and flourish for future generations. I endorse CIC Final Report recommendations 37 (a) and (b) and 43 (a), (b), (c), and (g), which states in part:

Every child in the state should receive a quality civics education, and judges, courts, teachers, and school administrators should be supported in their efforts to educate students about the judiciary and its function in a democratic society.

For more information on the Commission's recommendations, please see the attached.

In 2011 I appointed Administrative Presiding Justice Judith McConnell of the California Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, as Chair of a Civic Summit Steering Committee to plan and conduct a Civic Education Summit as an extension of her work chairing the Leadership Group on Civic Education and Public Outreach, an implementation committee for the CIC's civics education-related recommendations. The result of these efforts, the Civic Learning California Summit: Making Democracy Work, was held to great acclaim on February 28, 2013. Notably, it featured as its keynote speaker United States Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (Ret.), a national champion for civics education.

More than 200 attendees representing education, labor, business and community leaders, law school deans, and elected officials filled the Secretary of State Auditorium to capacity. Speakers included Secretary of State Debra Bowen; State Superintendent of Public Instruction Tom Torlakson; Judge Stacy Boulware Eurie; Thomas Saenz, President and General Counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF); Yvonne Walker, President of Service Employees International Union Local 1000, (SEIU); and Allan Zaremberg, President and Chief Executive Officer of the California Chamber of Commerce. Senate President pro Tem Darrell Steinberg introduced Justice O'Connor, and the State Bar of California conducted a call to action during which several legislators announced civics education-related legislation.

Post-Summit Findings and Evaluation

Following the summit, the Civic Summit Steering Committee learned that Justice O'Connor is willing to partner with the committee to move civics learning forward in California. We also found that a wide spectrum of other California leaders share this common purpose. And while these and other national groups such as the Conference of Chief Justices have established civics education as a key theme, respected state and national reports indicate that there is a persistent civics learning crisis.

The committee also discovered that no other group is effectively working to make civics education a priority in California. Committee members therefore concluded that the summit would necessarily not be the end of our efforts, but rather the launch of a long-term, incremental effort, and that given the success of the Summit, that effort would benefit greatly from their continued leadership. Finally, the committee learned that foundations and other organizations are willing to provide funding and in-kind donations to support these civics education efforts.

These efforts cannot, however, continue without an appropriate level of staffing. AOC staff were instrumental in helping the committee bring the summit to fruition, and it is my strong desire to have those staff continue to support the committee's ongoing work. I am aware of the increased workload and reduced staff levels at the AOC, and this request is not intended to create additional burden. It is my hope that the efforts I have outlined above can continue to be supported by 1-2 full-time staff members.

Thank you for your attention to this request, and for your support of my commitment to improving civics education in our state.

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to study the budget and operational components of the Court Interpreters Program to determine whether greater efficiencies can be implemented to deliver interpreter services to the courts. ## TASK

| XCOMPLETED: The Court Language Access Support Program (formerly Court Interpreter Program) has provided and continues to provide these interpreter-related services to the courts with a high degree of quality and efficiency. |

In a memo dated March 23, 2013, to then Administrative Director Steven Jahr, the Court Operations and Special Service Office Director reported that Court Interpreter Program (CIP) staff (now Court Language Access Support Program staff) are involved in the following activities:

- Court interpreter outreach and recruitment efforts (e.g., ongoing presentations at professional conferences, development of orientation programs, and production of informational materials)
- Test administration, development, and maintenance
- Organization of interpreter candidate test preparation workshops
- Development of language-specific workshops when a language is newly designated for certification
- Development of an online course curriculum for bilingual specialists
- Management of the American Sign Language (ASL) Video Remote Interpreting pilot, provision of direct support to courts and internal stakeholders regarding ASL issues, and analysis of local courts' use of ASL to assist with identification of pilot participants
- Creation of a curriculum on Deaf Intermediary Interpreting issues
- Organization of the annual meeting for statewide court interpreter education providers
- Organization of regional ethics and orientation workshops
- Coordination, with the trial courts, of the collection of court interpreter data for each statutorily mandated five-year language use and interpreter need study

In accordance with the intent behind directive 70, CLASP staff is continually working to identify internal efficiencies—through, for example, the integration of technology and the identification of best practices—that will benefit both the courts and the public. These efficiencies include:

- Moving from the use of AOC-specific tests and the reliance on a state test administrator to adoption of the National Center for State Courts’ national language exams. This change to a national entity not has increased the number of interpreters through reciprocity with those who meet California’s high standards Implementing a market-rate cost system whereby the test candidate covers the entire cost of taking the exams; these costs were previously paid by the judicial branch.
- Piloting and replicating the use of remote video technology with American Sign Language (ASL) interpreting sessions, which has resulted in cost savings for participating courts and the provision of enhanced access to the limited pool (35 for the entire state) of available ASL interpreters.
- Making available online mandatory orientation videos for newly registered and certified interpreters, which reduces training costs as well as travel expenses for the interpreters.

CLASP has provided and continues to provide these interpreter-related services to the courts with a high degree of quality and efficiency.

|                                     |  |                          |                        |

Since this report in 2013, CIP was renamed the Court Language Access Support Program (CLASP) and this unit has increased staff to take on broadened responsibilities as it relates to language access. CLASP is responsible for supporting ongoing interpreter services noted previously plus, for example, coordination of efforts relating to signage, forms translation, and any other language-related needs for the branch. As an example of continuing efforts to find efficiencies to benefit the courts and CLASP staff as well, CLASP has been working on updating the Court Interpreter Data Collection System (CIDCS) to provide interpreters the ability to enter information directly into the database that tracks interpreter usage. Several courts have requested this modification and it will improve the statistical information the Judicial Council is able to collect and report on interpreter usage. CIDCS also includes interpreter profile information for 1,800 interpreters across the state that was previously maintained by CLASP staff. The update will allow the interpreters to update basic profile information themselves, freeing CLASP staff to focus on the delivery of services to interpreters and the courts. Additionally, CLASP supported an 18-month effort by the Joint Working Group for California’s Language Access Plan that included public hearings and a 60-day formal public comment period on a draft of the plan to create the Strategic Plan for Language Access in the California Courts. An Implementation Task Force is now being appointed to help develop the methods and means for implementing the Language Access Plan in all 58 superior courts and the CLASP will continue to support this initiative.

This memorandum reports on the implementation of Judicial Council directive 70, which reads:

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to study the budget and operational components of the Court Interpreters Program to determine whether greater efficiencies can be implemented to deliver interpreter services to the courts. The Finance Division should not act as an impediment in the delivery of interpreter services to the courts.

The Roles of the Courts, Judicial Council, and AOC vis-à-vis Court Interpreters

The provision of qualified court interpreters to enhance the public's access to the courts is ultimately the responsibility of the superior courts, the Judicial Council, and the AOC. The roles of each of these entities are discussed below.

The Superior Courts

The superior courts are responsible for overseeing all aspects of the use of interpreters in the courts, including the selection, hiring, assignment, evaluation, compensation, and, if necessary, discipline and firing of court interpreters. Labor matters are handled uniquely by the courts in the four established bargaining regions for court interpreters; the AOC's Labor and Employee Relations group in the AOC's Human Resources Services Office may provide assistance, but negotiations and handling of grievances are the responsibility of each court.

The Judicial Council

The role of the Judicial Council in ensuring that the California courts have access to qualified interpreters was codified in January 1993 when the Legislature required the council to certify and register court interpreters and adopt standards and requirements for interpreter education. (Sen. Bill 1304; Stats. 1992, ch. 770.) Among other things, the statute requires the council to:

- Designate the languages for which certification programs shall be established;
- Approve entities to certify Spanish-language interpreters and interpreters for as many other languages as the council designates;
- Adopt standards and requirements for interpreter proficiency, continuing education, certification renewal, and discipline;
- Adopt standards of professional conduct for court interpreters;
- Adopt programs for interpreter recruiting, training, and continuing education and evaluation to ensure that an adequate number of interpreters are available and that they interpret competently; and
- Conduct a study of language and interpreter use and need in court proceedings, and report to the Governor and the Legislature every five years.

(Gov. Code, § 68562.)

The Judicial Council created the Court Interpreters Advisory Panel (CIAP) in 1993 to assist the council in implementing this legislation. The panel's membership is established by Government Code section 68560 et seq. and represents a diversity of languages, courts, geographic regions, and interests. Members must include a majority of court interpreters and may also include judges, court administrators, members of the bar, and other interested parties.

The AOC's Court Interpreters Program

The AOC's Court Interpreters Program (CIP), which is a unit within the Court Operations Special Services Office, staffs CIAP and assists in providing the courts with access to qualified certified and registered interpreters. CIP is not directly responsible for the provision of interpreter services to the courts or the public; its principal responsibility is to build a pipeline of qualified court interpreters for the courts by facilitating the recruitment of interpreters and managing the interpreter certification examination processes.

In support of these efforts, CIP staff are involved in the following activities, under the direction of CIAP:

- Court interpreter outreach and recruitment efforts (e.g., ongoing presentations at professional conferences, development of orientation programs, and production of informational materials)
- Test administration, development, and maintenance
- Organization of interpreter candidate test preparation workshops
- Development of language-specific workshops when a language is newly designated for certification
- Development of an online course curriculum for bilingual specialists
- Management of the American Sign Language (ASL) Video Remote Interpreting pilot, provision of direct support to courts and internal stakeholders regarding ASL issues, and analysis of local courts' use of ASL to assist with identification of pilot participants
- Creation of a curriculum on Deaf Intermediary Interpreting issues
- Organization of the annual meeting for statewide court interpreter education providers
- Organization of regional ethics and orientation workshops
- Coordination, with the trial courts, of the collection of court interpreter data for each statutorily mandated five-year language use and interpreter need study

In our view, CIP has provided and continues to provide these interpreter-related services to the courts with a high degree of quality and efficiency.

Efforts to Enhance Efficiencies Within the CIP

In accordance with the intent behind directive 70, CIP staff have been working for the past few years to identify internal efficiencies—through, for example, the integration of technology and the identification of best practices—that will benefit both the courts and the public. These efficiencies include:

- Moving from the use of AOC-specific tests and the reliance on a state test administrator to adoption of the National Center for State Courts' national language exams. This change to a national entity not only has increased the number of interpreters through reciprocity with those who meet California's high standards, but also has eliminated the need to expend funds on test development and maintenance.
- Implementing a market-rate cost system whereby the test candidate covers the entire cost of taking the exams; these costs were previously paid by the judicial branch.

- Piloting and replicating the use of remote video technology with American Sign Language (ASL) interpreting sessions, which has resulted in cost savings for participating courts and the provision of enhanced access to the limited pool (35 for the entire state) of available ASL interpreters.
- Making available online mandatory orientation videos for newly registered and certified interpreters, which reduces training costs as well as travel expenses for the interpreters.

Notably, CIP has been performing its work with a staff that has been reduced significantly since the time the Strategic Evaluation Committee began its evaluation process. Additionally, CIP has begun serving as the AOC's central communications and coordination hub for all agencywide interpreter-related matters, as illustrated on the attached functional organizational chart for the CIP. This role is critical, because issues pertaining to court interpreters span multiple offices, including, among others, the Fiscal Services Office (administration of Program 45.45<sup>1</sup> and reimbursement of courts for interpreter-related expenses); the Center for Families, Children & the Courts (administration of grant funds to provide court interpreters in certain cases involving domestic violence); and the Human Resources Services Office (labor negotiation services on behalf of courts).

In its role as the AOC's communications clearinghouse for interpreter issues, CIP will be copied on most communications and present at meetings involving interpreter issues.<sup>2</sup> CIP will also be responsible for reviewing and analyzing those issues to ensure that all affected offices are included as appropriate in their resolution. In effect, CIP will serve as the "project manager" for interpreter issues, which will ensure that all concerned staff and managers are kept apprised of matters that affect their respective areas of responsibility.

This model has already been put into place, and has demonstrated its potential for improving efficiencies within the AOC. Specifically, the CIP is currently serving as the project lead on an AOC-wide effort to improve the administration of Program 45.45 funds and provide enhanced guidance to the superior courts as to what interpreter expenses will be reimbursed. As a first step, CIP staff convened a meeting of staff from multiple offices to develop a consistent and agreed-upon scope of the project. Once all affected offices agreed on the issues to be resolved, CIP developed a project plan for arriving at the ultimate goal, i.e., clearer, more consistent guidelines for courts vis-à-vis what expenses are reimbursable and the reimbursement process. CIP then set in motion the first phase of the project plan, which was working with the Legal Services Office to secure a legal opinion on permissible court expenditures on interpreter expenses. Once the legal parameters have been established, CIP will work with the Fiscal Services Office on a

<sup>1</sup> The annual California Budget Act contains an appropriation for the judicial branch. Within that appropriation, a specific appropriation commonly referred to by the shorthand Program 45.45 exists for court interpreter expenses.

<sup>2</sup> CIP will not necessarily be included, however, in all interpreter-related issues. For example, it is not anticipated that CIP would be included in discussions about employment actions involving individual interpreters or other privileged and/or confidential matters.

financial analysis of what interpreter services can be reimbursed within those parameters, in light of the projected Program 45.45 budget. CIP will then lead the effort to inform branch leadership of both the legal and the fiscal analyses so that leadership can make a policy decision as to which expenses should be reimbursed. Finally, CIP will communicate the policy decision to the superior courts in a clear, user-friendly manner and will work with Fiscal Services on improvements to the reimbursement process itself.

The above is only the first example of the types of projects that CIP will coordinate in its new role. With the increasing focus on court interpreters as part of the broader language access issue, it is expected that there will be many other such issues projects in the near future.

One staff member was retained to ensure that archiving, cataloging, and searching of Judicial Council materials was able to continue but that staff member subsequently left in June of 2013.

In addition, the council collaborated with the California Judicial Center Library (CJCL) to transfer a part of the collection from the former JAL to the CJCL. Any materials that were transferred to the CJCL were offered to council offices/divisions for their use. Anything remaining was disposed of and the current JAL space has been repurposed.

E&P recommends that the Judicial Council direct the Administrative Director of the Courts to consider SEC Recommendations 7-11(a) and (b) and 7-14 and implement the necessary organizational and staffing changes, contingent upon the council's approval of an organizational structure for the AOC and taking into account the results of the classification and compensation studies to be completed.

Sec Recommendation 7-11

COSSO's current level of approximately 74 positions (including those reassigned from the former regional offices as recommended in this report) should be reduced. To achieve the reduction the areas listed below should be reviewed and considered, and appropriate actions taken.

This directive is now considered complete as follows:

On August 21, 2015 the JCC completed its Classification and Compensation Study that resulted in the implementation of a new salary structure for the organization. The compensation phase of the project followed the classification portion of the study that began in December 2013 and ended in March of 2015, when JCC staff received their new classification specifications. All positions in the JCC were evaluated, and JCC employees were subsequently assigned a classification and provided with information as to whether their salary fell within, above, or below the new salary ranges employee classifications.

The results of the classification study indicated that the duties of the Assistant Director of Court Operations Services, formerly COSSO, aligned with the new "Principal Manager" classification specifications. This position was subsequently re-classed to a Principal Manager.

Since the end of FY 10-11, the number of Judicial Council employees in research classifications has declined by approximately 45%. To improve the efficiency and effectiveness of research in support of the Judicial Council and the courts, and consistent with Judicial Council Directives 53 and 72.1, all research analysts currently at the Judicial Council have been consolidated into offices within the Operations and Program Division. Managers overseeing research in those offices began discussions in October 2012 and have implemented a protocol to share information, manage the workforce reduction and address staffing current and future projects.

This directive was completed August 2013.
